Mr. MADDEN. There is no secret, Mr. Chairman, about the fact that the Committee on Appropriations had some doubt when it was considering the request of the Navy Department for $6,500,000 for the elevation of the turret guns on the battleships as to the propriety of making the appropriation, but the technical men of the Navy testified positively before us that England had elevated the turret guns of her ships to give them a longer range. In common with other members of the Committee on Appropriations I felt at the time that if we elevated our turret guns we would be violating the treaty, but we thought that in the face of the statement by responsible naval officers of the Government that England was, as a matter of fact, elevating the guns on her ships since the conference we would be derelict in the performance of the duty devolving upon us if we failed to bring our guns up to the same degree of efficiency as theirs.

Being still in doubt, we took the precaution to put the appropriation in such language that it could not be used if it violated the treaty. But it did not rest on that. The matter of the violation of the treaty was not the thing that the question turned on afterwards. The question was one of veracity, and the investigation that I made personally as Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, after the appropriation had become a law, led me to the conclusion that somebody had lied.

Mr. BLANTON. That is exactly what I said. You are corroborating me.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not deny what the gentleman said. I then assumed the responsibility, as Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, of going to the Navy and demanding that the money should not be used. [Applause.] I said if it were to be used I would get on the floor of the House and denounce the whole procedure. It was not used.

The President of the United States issued an order that it should not be used. In the face of all the facts in connection with the proposition I thought that the Committee on Appropriations would be justified in repealing the appropriation, and I offered an amendment on the floor when the deficiency bill was under consideration providing for the repeal of the appropriation and the authority which the provision carried to elevate the turret guns on the American battleships, and the House unanimously voted to concur in the amendment which I offered.

There is nothing secret about what we did. We have no apology to offer as members of the Committee on Appropriations for what we did. We did our duty in the beginning as we saw our duty, and when we discovered that we had done what we ought not to have done we did our duty in the second instance by repealing the appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. I was not criticizing the Appropriations Committee or its efficient chairman. I commend him for what he did in keeping this money from being used and in having it returned to the Treasury where it belongs. He bravely calls a spade a spade.

The Congress passed that bill, and then the President stopped the money. The President would not allow that money to be spent. The President upheld the very arguments that we then made here on the floor, that it was not necessary and was in violation of our treaty.

Mr. RICH. What President was that?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, he was a Republican President. There is some good in Republican Presidents. He upheld the treaty, and he would not allow the money to be spent in that way.

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes. He kept it from being spent.

Mr. BRITTEN. But the guns were elevated.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, finally. You cannot stop these naval officers when they start something. They will keep on after Congress until they get what they want just like these Army officers. They get what they want.

For this fiscal year the President in his Budget asked us to appropriate—and we did appropriate—$349,523,278 for the Army, but as soon as Congress adjourned the big Secretary of the War went before Secretary Ickes and his Public Works Board, and he got $333,721,227 more than the Congress had given. Are you for that?

As requested by the President in his Budget we appropriated for the Navy for this fiscal year the sum of $308,669,562, and as soon as the Congress adjourned, Mr. Secretary Swanson went before Mr. Secretary Ickes and his Public Works Board and got from them $277,265,924 more for the Navy. And now by this bill, about which the President himself has said nothing, we are authorizing an expenditure of $470,000,000 more. Is not that handing it out in rather large sums?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6604) to establish the composition of the United States Navy with respect to the categories of vessels limited by the treaties signed at Washington, February 6, 1922, and at London April 22, 1930, at the limits prescribed by those treaties; to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 6604, with Mr. BLANTON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, in presenting this bill to the House for consideration I deem it important at the very outset to call attention to the three objectives which it seeks to accomplish: First, the measure establishes the strength of the United States Navy in respect of the categories of ships that are limited by international agreement; second, it authorizes the President to undertake the construction of such ships as are required to maintain the Navy in under-age units at the strength prescribed by treaty; third, it authorizes the appropriations necessary for such building.

To bring the Navy up to treaty strength in under-age ships will require the construction of 102 new ships to take the place of obsolete ones. These 102 new ships will consist of 65 destroyers, 1 airplane carrier, 30 submarines, and 6 cruisers.

The measure leaves absolutely in the hands of the President the decision as to when he shall request appropriations for the commencement of the various units.

When this bill is boiled down to its last analysis, it is simply an authorization for replacement of obsolete ships, plus a definite statement that it is the policy of the United States to maintain the Navy at whatever limits may be established by international agreement.

The Washington and London treaties permit the United States to have a total of 1,186,000 tons distributed through the various categories. On December 31, 1933, we actually had 372 ships, aggregating 1,038,660 tons, but of this number 288 ships which add up to 330,110 tons were over-age, leaving us but 84 under-age ships of a tonnage of 708,550.

To build the ships that we now need to bring us up to treaty strength in under-age ships will involve an expenditure of approximately $380,000,000. Of course, this is an estimate which may have to be revised because of uncertainties as to future costs of labor and material. If commenced in the fiscal year 1935, the program would require from 7 to 8 years for completion.

Mr. Chairman, the greatest source of weakness of the United States on the sea arises from the lack of a definite policy as to the building and maintenance of the Navy. For many years we have affirmed our intention "to maintain the Navy in sufficient strength to support the national policies and commerce and to guard the continental and overseas possessions of the United States." The fact remains, however, that we have never had such a Navy, and unless this bill is enacted into law we never will have one. The country and Congress should thoroughly understand that the policies of the Government cannot be maintained and supported with obsolete ships. For the first time in the history of this country we are now trying to provide a logical, orderly plan for the maintenance of the Navy at a level which is sufficient to provide against emergencies. This measure will give no offense and involves no threat to any foreign power and will require the least possible burden on our taxpayers.

The navies of the United States, Great Britain, and Japan are now limited by treaty to a definite maximum strength in each of the categories into which combatant ships are divided. The Treaty of Washington, 1922, fixed limits to the permissible strength in capital ships and aircraft carriers. The Treaty of London, 1930, prescribed limits for all remaining categories, namely, cruisers, destroyers, and submarines. The Treaty of Washington is to continue in effect until denounced by one of the signatories. The Treaty of London will expire on December 31, 1936.

The United States believes whole-heartedly in limitation of armaments, and we have contributed very greatly to the consummation of that ideal. At the Washington conference we took the unprecedented course of surrendering voluntarily the naval supremacy which we then possessed. We agreed to scrap 11 of the most powerful battleships and battle cruisers which have ever been designed. In addition we took out of the line and agreed to scrap 20 completed battleships. Furthermore, we agreed not to increase the strength of our naval bases or fortifications in the Pacific except on the coasts of the United States, Alaska, the Aleutian Islands, Hawaii, and the Canal Zone, and not to establish new bases or fortifications in insular possessions which we then held or might acquire. In making this sacrifice we announced to the world that we were willing to forego supremacy and that we would be content with strength equal to that of Great Britain but measurably greater than that of any other power. No other nation on earth has made a contribution which can approach that of the United States. If limitation is to be an influence for the furtherance of peace rather than a factor which produces additional uncertainty and danger, all of the naval powers must act similarly. So long as a situation continues as at present, with one nation built right up to the limit in all categories, whereas another is far short of her limits, the cause of peace is gravely jeopardized.

The United States would be the first to applaud limitation at a lower level, and repeatedly has used every effort to accomplish such a reduction. We believe that the naval strength required for our security is relative to that possessed by other powers. But let me impress upon you with all the force and earnestness at my command that we must maintain a navy of under-age ships substantially at the limits fixed by international agreement.

Secretary of State Hughes, who presided over the Washington Conference, declared in October 1922:

> This Government has taken the lead in securing the reduction of naval armament, but the Navy that we retain under the agreement should be maintained with efficient personnel and pride in the service. It is essential that we should maintain the relative naval strength of the United States. That, in my judgment, is the way to peace and security. It will be upon that basis that we would enter in future conferences or make agreements for limitation, and it would be folly to undermine our position.

As the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] pointed out in presenting the naval appropriation bill for 1935, "disarmament by example is a dismal failure." For 11 long years we followed that siren while other nations employed every facility to increase their respective navies. If the other naval powers will join with us, at the prospective naval conference to be held in 1935, in writing a treaty to impose further limitations on naval strength, this country will welcome such an achievement. In the meantime, however, we must act on the basis of the treaties now in existence. Further, let no one forget that the limitations heretofore achieved have been accomplished solely because of the strength of the United States. At the Washington Conference, when the United States offered to scrap great numbers of existing ships and to surrender her dominant naval position, all other nations applauded with the wildest enthusiasm. None of them was required to make a sacrifice which compared with ours in any way. At Geneva in 1927, at London in 1930, and in the various disarmament discussions under the auspices of the League of Nations every suggestion by the United States that other nations should volunteer to come down to our level has been rejected as being preposterous.

One of the fundamental objectives of the treaties for the limitation of armaments is to eliminate all suspicion of a naval race. We hoped for this after the Washington Conference and again after the London Conference. But to realize this hope it is essential that the balance so arrived at be maintained at all times. So long as we build steadily with the avowed purpose of conforming strictly to treaty, there can and will be no objection either here or abroad. Just so soon, however, as we drop behind, apprehension will be felt by your own people and distrust will develop abroad.

On January 24 the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] argued that it is essential to eliminate great variations in the rate of building, that the work should be kept as steady as possible. He is absolutely correct. It is axiomatic that work of any nature whatsoever can be carried out better and cheaper if the rate is uniform. This is particularly true when the undertaking is of great magnitude. The ideal is to have the planning, design, and execution of a project proceed smoothly. To achieve that is one of the fundamental purposes of this bill. It is an objective which the Navy has desired for years, but which heretofore has never been possible. As an illustration of what can be accomplished, the 5-year naval aircraft program approved by Congress in 1926 was estimated to cost $85,000,000. When finished in June 1931, the actual cost was $58,000,000. This great saving of nearly $27,000,000 represents 31 percent of the estimated cost and was due primarily to the fact that there was an orderly continuing program.

Let me emphasize the fact that, in addition to all ships now building and appropriated for, to reach treaty strength in ships by December 31, 1936, when the London Treaty will expire, the following number of ships would have to be constructed by each power:

United States	102

The above figures do not include any replacement of capital ships for the reason that the London Treaty postponed the laying down of any units in that category until after December 31, 1936.

Mr. Chairman, let me call your attention to the fact that over-age ships are obsolete. It must ever be remembered when we consider over-age ships that such ships are just as obsolete today as are the aircrafts which were built in 1918. Some of the planes we then sent our aviators aloft in were referred to as "flying coffins." These over-age ships, with inferior gun power, with slower speed, with deteriorated hulls and machinery, will truly be "floating coffins" if they are sent to battle against modern ships. We keep them today because they are better than nothing at all, but they are not ships on which to send the youth of this country to battle with an enemy. No country has a moral right to demand that her sailors go into battle with strength and equipment inferior to an opponent's. Yet, unless we prepare adequately in times of peace, that is the inevitable necessity when war comes. In general, it is true that a naval war must be fought with the ships that are in existence at the time war breaks out.

Are the people of this country willing to send their sons to meet an enemy in ships that are old, slow, and obsolete and inferior in strength in order to save a few dollars? Is the defense of our country to be jeopardized? Are the lives of your sons and grandsons to be offered up as a living sacrifice because you are unwilling to provide the funds for the support of a proper navy in times of peace?

It is important for you to know that since January 1, 1922, to November 1, 1933, the United States has laid down and appropriated for 74 ships of 330,980 tons; and that in that same period Great Britain has laid down and appropriated for 170 ships of 453,415 tons; Japan, 188 ships of 482,962 tons; France, 200 ships of a tonnage of 508,328; and Italy, 147 ships, 298,971 tons.

In this country the Army and Navy have practically nothing to do with shaping our national policies. These services are the servants and not the masters of the civil Government. No American need fear that the United States will ever become militaristic. It is the voice of the people that will ever rule this country of ours, and it is the voice of the people that will determine the strength of our Army and Navy. For this Government to maintain a Navy which is not strong enough to win in battle is the worst form of extravagance. It lulls the people into a false sense of security and may have the most disastrous consequences.

Mr. Chairman, the position of our country as a world power and the success of our policies are closely related to the strength of our Navy. Without doubt, our influence in the Far East has been greatly lessened with the decrease of the strength of our Navy as compared with that of Japan. The national situation today is far from reassuring; the future is far from bright. We stand practically alone and friendless in this turbulent world and must depend upon ourselves for our protection and defense.

Mr. Chairman, there is one other aspect of this legislation to which I want to invite attention. It is an aspect of grave concern, for it may have a bearing upon the position of this Nation in the councils of the world for many years to come.

During next year, the year 1935, possibly before another session of Congress can act on any of these questions, a conference composed of delegates from the British Empire, Japan, and the United States must convene to revise, continue, or abandon the London Treaty of 1930. If our delegation goes to that conference without a definite declaration of this Nation's policy with regard to its Navy, its prestige is almost nil. The British Empire has such a policy—one which has made that empire great and kept it great for centuries. Japan has such a policy—one which has lifted her from the shadows of thousands of years of oriental seclusion to a place among the foremost nations of the earth. Their delegations will go to the conference firm in the knowledge of those policies and secure in the fact that their respective governments have kept up their naval strengths to the limit of their agreement.

Shall our delegation go to that meeting with less? Shall we put the American people in a position in which their welfare and their defense is to be at the mercy of those two other delegations? Or shall we send our delegation, backed by the stalwart will of this peace-loving Nation of ours, to say, "We are as strong as you. We will willingly reduce our armament if you will do the same proportionately. But if you will not, we will match you ship for ship and gun for gun. Our negligence in the past is not a prophecy of the future. Agree with us to reduce the burden of arms ratably among us all, for the sake of peace and for the hope of friendship."

I believe that the safety and welfare of this country insistently demand the enactment of this bill.

I believe that no people in the world have a more generous and noble character than the people of the United States. So long as we remain strong our actions in world affairs will be directed by our own people. If we become weak, our actions will be controlled by a less generous and less noble people.

No government which fails to provide for its own perservation against the assaults of every probable foe is entitled to the support of its people. The primary duty of government is self-preservation, and no logic can justify it in stripping itself of its means of defense, and relying for its preservation upon the mercy, the pity, or the love of other nations. [Applause.]

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Is it not true that shipbuilding for the navies of Great Britain and Japan has increased since the $238,000,000 was allocated by the Public Works Administration?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I would say it is the definite policy, as stated by the First Lord of the Admiralty of the British Government, to be up to treaty strength about 1936. Japan already is up to treaty strength.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. But is it not true that it accelerated since the $238,000,000 was allocated by the United States Government through the Public Works Administration?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I do not agree with the gentleman, because Great Britain and Japan both have had a definite, steady, continuing building program ever since the Washington and London Treaties.

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN. Did I understand the gentleman to say the United States took the initiative in disarmament?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It did.

Mr. DUNN. Did I understand the gentleman to say that a number of nations rejected the proposal of the United States?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman misunderstood me altogether. I stated that it was at the instance of the Washington Treaty that the first great step was taken in the world to bring about a limitation of naval armaments. Repeatedly this country has made an effort to reduce armament, but the other nations have refused to come down to the low level at which we were at the time we offered the proposal.

Mr. DUNN. Now, may I ask the gentleman, does he know the names of the nations which refused to accept that proposition?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No. I am sorry I cannot give the gentleman that information.

Mr. DELANEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. DELANEY. Is it not a fact that last year the Naval Affairs Committee unanimously reported out a bill allocating something like $625,000,000 for a building program?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is correct.

Mr. DELANEY. And does not the chairman of this committee think this is one of the best assurances we may have against possible attack by an enemy?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I think the enactment of this bill will do more to bring down naval armament than anything else the Congress could possibly do. [Applause.]

In that connection let me make this statement: I pointed out that we had 372 ships. This bill does not add a single ship to the United States Navy lines. It merely takes the place of old and obsolete ships. This is the picture: We have today 372 ships. We have 84 ships under-age. We authorize the building of 102 ships in this bill. We are appropriating for 54 ships in the regular annual appropriation bill, making a total of 242 ships. That will be the total strength of the United States Navy in under-age ships after every one of these ships that is called for in this bill has been built. Therefore, between now and 1936 the United States will be compelled to destroy 132 old-and-obsolete ships.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. KENNEY. The gentleman feels we ought to start this shipbuilding program right away, does he not?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I certainly do.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. I wish the gentleman would put in the RECORD the comparative data contained in the hearings on pages 198 and 199.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I think that is the data which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] had inserted in the RECORD during the discussion of the rule.

Mr. McFARLANE. No. That was another table.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to incorporate in the RECORD all of the tables that appear in the record of the hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. STUDLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. STUDLEY. Is it the gentleman's opinion that any fleet of ships can remain in safety if enemy airplanes can get above them?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Every ship is so constructed as to endeavor to meet every form of attack. We propose in this bill later to offer an amendment to take care of the necessary aviation that will go with the fleet. Aviation is just as important as guns and powder, and all must go together to make an effective unit.

Mr. REILLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. Did the London Conference formulate any program for cutting down navies, or the Washington Conference?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The Washington Conference was the only one by which limitation was brought about, except that the London Conference agreed to extend the life of the battleships.

Mr. REILLY. Did all nations conform to the Washington agreement?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Oh, yes; because nothing was limited except battleships and cruisers.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves 1 minute.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL].

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, the first essential in government is liberty. Along with liberty go justice, security, and prosperity. In this bill we have security, and I gladly support the measure. I wish only that it went a step further and gave us more armament.

I am, however, an advocate of disarmament. If it were within my power, I would sink every naval vessel afloat; but, knowing the type of individuals who control foreign governments, knowing their selfish aims and desires, and knowing how they have so consistently hoodwinked the American people, I think that anything we do in the line of naval development should be done as soon as possible and to as great an extent as possible.

I am not an advocate of a Navy second to none; I am an advocate of a Navy superior to any.

Had the American Government, in the days preceding the World War, listened to the General Staff of the Army and to the officials of the Navy instead of the pacifists, we would not have saddled upon our people $51,000,000,000 of expenditures due entirely to the World War and due primarily to the fact that we were unprepared. I have a clipping here which states that, at 5-percent interest, what we already have expended on the cost of the World War would yield a return sufficient to pay a life-long pension of $25 a month to every unemployed man in America. In addition, we will pay another $50,000,000,000 in pension awards before our obligations are fully discharged. So, Mr. Chairman, we can see how stupid we are when we listen to those who cry peace when they know there is no peace. Universal peace is as far removed from this earth today under the capitalistic system as is the Milky Way. There is no question about it. Our forefathers, the men who made our Nation, believed in peace; they believed in liberty; they came to America with that objective. But you recall that even while attending divine worship they carried their guns with them. That is something we should always remember.

Mr. Chairman, I wish the Members today to consider the name Roosevelt. We had an inimitable Roosevelt, the peerless Teddy. I call him "peerless." He was one American who loved peace but who was not afraid of any nation. He sent the fleet around the world. Teddy Roosevelt increased the pay of the armed services.

Today we have another Roosevelt in the White House. Under his direction we are withdrawing the fleet from where it ought to be; that is, taking it from the West coast and bringing it to the East coast at an expense of more than $4,000,000.

Today is President Roosevelt's birthday. I know each and every one of you—and Americans everywhere—will join me in congratulating him on his birthday. We hope he will have many more. He has a smile which is inspiring, sincere, and honest; but I wonder if he ever stops to consider the thousands upon thousands of American people, especially those in the armed services of the country, whose pay has been cut by his Executive order, cut down to almost nothing in some instances. I hope the President will continue to smile, but I hope at the same time he will recommend to this Congress proper legislation so that the thousands of Americans in the armed services of the country can also smile.

The records prove, and prove unquestionably, that the Republicans have been the friends of the service. Twice they raised the pay of the personnel. What have we Democrats done? Twice we have reduced the pay of the personnel. This is something for the Members of the House to consider.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. Does the gentleman mean that all Democrats joined in reducing the pay of the personnel of the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Only those Democrats who followed the whip.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it not the fact that, the Democrats having a majority of 213, any legislation of a controversial nature that goes through this House must, of course, bear the Democratic stamp of approval?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Absolutely; and that is why I am appealing to the Democratic Membership on my side of the House from a humanitarian standpoint, and on the birthday of our President.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Is it not a fact that on a percentage basis more Republicans voted for the Economy Act than Democrats? I ask this question not in an apologetic attitude for our side of the House, for I voted for the Economy Act.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Answering the gentleman from Kentucky, I may say that if the Republicans voted as he indicates, in following the request of the President, they did it from a magnanimous spirit of cooperation.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. My question is whether the gentleman is not directing his remarks toward something that was covered by a certain Democratic gag rule a year after the Economy Act was passed? The gentleman's reply to the gentleman from Kentucky should be directed at the rule preventing the consideration of the salary question on the floor of this House even though the country was demanding such serious consideration.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Answering the gentleman from Illinois, I may state that the Democratic members, judging from the speech made this afternoon by the distinguished gentleman from Texas, are intimating that they were unfair in their action on the gag rule.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that, under the rule, debate must be confined to the bill.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I shall confine my remarks to the bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, the point of order is not well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will keep within the rule, which requires that debate be confined to the bill.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Well, I hope there is no further gag.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Not for a moment. I just said, and I hope it will go in the RECORD, I hope there will be no further gag.

We Democrats are going to vote for this bill, and I feel confident the Republicans will also, judging from their past record in the interest of defense. But, by our failure to restore the amount of the pay reduction to the armed services, we are throwing sand in the mechanism, for, while we have a most admirable personnel in our armed forces, loyal and efficient, they are suffering from our policy in the matter of pay.

Mr. FORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I will yield to the distinguished Democratic Congressman from California, who has endorsed a Republican Senator for reelection.

Mr. FORD. When you say "we", you do not include yourself in the Democratic group, do you?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that the gentleman is speaking on a subject not contained in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order has been raised by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is not well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from California will proceed in order.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I will confine myself to ships, but of what utility is a ship unless you have personnel and, in this connection, may I say personnel who are adequately compensated? I am in order because I am linking up personnel with ships, something we are trying to create here.

I contend that we, as representatives of the people, are not doing the square thing for the personnel of the Army and Navy. The enlisted man receives only $17.85 per month. We cut his rations, we cut his clothing allowance, and we take his bonus from him. He suffers an average pay deduction of 33 percent, which is unfair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will desist. A point of order has been made. The gentleman must obey the rules and confine his remarks to the bill.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I should like to ask the Chairman if I may discuss a few admirals. Is that in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California knows of what the bill consists and must confine his remarks to the bill.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Then I will confine my remarks to the bill. Down at San Diego we have a number of rusty vessels, and I do hope that this bill will pass so that we can replace these obsolete vessels with modern war craft and thus be in a position, when we enter another naval conference, to demand and insist upon equality, in justice to our own Nation and to other signatories of the conference. We have always been euchred at every conference.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DREWRY].

Mr. DREWRY. Mr. Chairman, this bill is brief but positive and definite. It has only two purposes; however, with a condition attached.

The first purpose is to prescribe the composition of the United States Navy; namely, that it shall be established at the full treaty strength. A further purpose is to authorize the construction of such ships as will carry out the said plan.

The condition attached is that if other nations, by agreement, wish to further limit armament, then the United States will limit its Navy.

Stated in other words, this proposed legislation contains a statement of our intention to have a Navy second to none; authorizes construction to effectuate that intention but agrees to limit armament if other nations agree to do the same.

If this bill passes and becomes law, the Congress of the United States and the President hereby say that there shall be no more trifling with the national defense and the security of the country as far as the Navy is concerned. The passage of this legislation is notice to the world that the United States intends to build its Navy to the limit prescribed by the treaties of Washington in 1922 and London in 1930.

After the World War it seemed to right-thinking men the world over that, with the horrors of the past conflict fresh in their minds, men of all nations would be willing to agree never again to engage in warfare, if there was any way by which it could be avoided. It was understood that if the countries of the world could agree among themselves to limit their armament, then there would be a forward step to universal peace.

The United States had never fought a war of aggression or for material gain. It had announced its policy in this regard so often that it seemed all nations must recognize its sincerity. The United States, therefore, thought that the time was ripe to make an attempt toward decreasing the burden of the nations in keeping up a war-time armament. At the invitation of the United States a conference was held in Washington, to which came the representatives of the nations to sit around the table and discuss the possibilities of an agreement that would tend to promote the peace of the world. This assembly was one of the most remarkable meetings that ever took place.

The result was disappointing, but the United States, determined to show by example that it was willing to make a sacrifice, bore the burden. With a magnificent gesture—magnificent, but, in my opinion, foolishly extravagant with the taxpayers' money—it threw $375,000,000 of fine ships into the greedy waves. Great Britain and Japan applauded the act and got rid of some of their old ships, with an agreement that the United States, Great Britain, and Japan would in the future keep to a certain proportion of capital ships. France and Italy, in effect, said they had nothing to throw away. In battleship and plane-carrier strength there was to be a 5–5–3 ratio, but there was no limit to the building of cruisers, destroyers, submarines, airplanes, and any other naval auxiliaries. Japan would not consent to this, however, until the United States had agreed to give up its right to a fortified naval base in the island of Guam, many thousands of miles from our shores.

The farther away a country is from a naval base, the larger is the vessel needed to cover the cruising area. Because of the scarcity of naval bases the fleet must be supplied with a corresponding larger number of supply ships, colliers, tenders, and repair ships. When the United States gave up the right to fortify the island of Guam, it came dangerously close to isolating itself from a commanding position in world affairs.

The Washington Conference was a greater disaster to us than any we have ever suffered on the seas. For the sake of gaining the credit of advocating a world policy of peace—an empty honor, by the way, as many are now beginning to realize—we sacrificed, to a large extent, our national defense and very probably prevented ourselves from ever getting the glory of establishing such a world policy. This was shown by the scant attention paid our representatives to Geneva. The Washington Conference did not accomplish much, so far as establishing the peace of the world was concerned. It was a disaster for the United States—a greater disaster than any naval battle we could have lost. At one blow we sunk $375,000,000 worth of ships, and we put ourselves in a position where we must expend more millions than we threw away in order to protect our interests in the future. From the position of having the strongest navy in the world, we reduced ourselves to a level with Great Britain and a 5–3 ratio to Japan, but only so far as battleships and plane carriers were concerned.

After a period of reflection, when the emotional effect of the tragic performance on our part was past, there came the sober realization of "the morning after." It was then Secretary Hughes said:

> It is essential that we should maintain the relative naval strength of the United States.

That could not be done without the expenditure of more money, and if more money had to be spent, how could the good effects (?) of the conference be proved to the taxpayer? So the money has not been spent, and now our naval authorities unanimously agree that we have not maintained our relative naval strength.

Then came the Geneva Conference. That was as futile a conference as the Washington one was foolish. That fine old naval officer, Admiral Hilary Jones, with the other United States representatives, refused to agree, on the part of the United States, that it would further disarm until the other nations would agree to the same course. Nothing, therefore, was accomplished.

In 1930 was held the London Conference. Little was done, except an agreement as to class A cruisers. The dispute, as at Geneva, centered mostly on the size of our cruisers; because we had no bases close enough to each other, we must have ships with a cruising radius sufficiently great to permit us to establish bases after a war begins. That means large cruisers. England and Japan, with their naval bases not so widely scattered, can employ smaller cruisers. If we ever agree to limit the size of our cruisers, then our weakness is a foregone conclusion. In the meantime, the year 1936 is approaching, at which time the naval agreements cease. The United States has failed to keep its Navy up to the treaty strength which was permitted us. Instead of the ratio of 5–5–3, which was the object toward which the nations of the United States, Great Britain, and Japan have been striving, the United States is below Great Britain, and in some categories, even below Japan. It is a dangerous situation.

As of November 1, 1933, no appropriations had been made for the construction of the following ships which the United States, under the terms of the London Treaty, is permitted to lay down prior to December 31, 1936:

	Tons
1 aircraft carrier	15,200
1 cruiser A	17,350
5 cruisers B	47,100
5 destroyers (over 1,500 tons)	9,200
60 destroyers (not over 1,500 tons)	90,000
30 submarines	35,530

After this tonnage is made up to put us on a comparatively equal status with the other navies, we would still have left certain replacements for certain ships.

Great Britain has carried out a definite program. It has had in each year a uniform building program of 3 cruisers, 9 destroyers, 3 submarines, and several miscellaneous craft. As late as March 7, 1932, Parliament was informed that "we must have the ships which we are allowed to have by 1936 by our treaty, and there is no doubt that we shall have them." Since the announcement of the United States program and the use of N.R.A. funds, the British Admiralty is reported as asking not only that Britain build up to the full treaty strength, but is also demanding a heavy replacement program on the assumption that the present naval holiday will end December 31, 1936. The new program is said to include 25 new cruisers of a most formidable type. New capital ships are being designed, and the building of 15 to 18 destroyers a year to replace obsolete tonnage of 100,000 tons is proposed.

Since the Washington Treaty of 1922, Japan has maintained a steady building program with the object of keeping the Japanese Navy up to treaty limits and modern underage vessels. This program provides for the construction by 1936 of a total of 68 vessels of all classes; a modernization program and an aircraft program have been approved in addition to the above. An additional naval building program has been tentatively approved by the Japanese Cabinet, and when approved by the Diet, will provide for all except 600 of the tonnage allowed Japan by the treaty with certain provisions. I take these figures from a statement made by Admiral Stanley before the Naval Subcommittee on Appropriations.

Fortunately for this country a virile, active, common-sense man was put in the White House, and he has announced that our Navy must be kept up to the treaty strength and directed the expenditure of $238,000,000 as the first step toward this end. Already this action has been justified, and Great Britain and Japan are now making suggestions that further agreements be made to disarm to a degree that will save expenditures for big navies, and yet will enable each nation to have a navy that will be adequate for its needs. I believe this will be the right policy for us to pursue. Say to the world "we will agree to limit our Navy, if you will agree to limit yours—all we ask is equality—but we will never agree to put ourselves in a weakened condition. If you are not willing to agree to limited disarmament, then we will build such a navy as we think is necessary without your consent. We will take care of ourselves and you can do the same." This is virtually what the President and the Secretary of the Navy have said. It is the greatest move for peace that has been made since the World War. The United States must always have an adequate Navy for the protection of the interests of the country and its people. The size and kind of it must depend upon the welfare and needs of the country. If the national defense requires an increase of our Navy—and I think it does—then ships should be built, and I see no reason for asking permission of any other nation that we be allowed to build them, except as subject to existing treaties.

This bill, therefore, provides that, subject to the Treaties of Washington and London, the President is authorized to undertake, prior to December 31, 1936, in addition to ships already authorized, the construction of one aircraft carrier of approximately 15,000 tons; ninety-nine 200 tons aggregate of destroyers; thirty-five 530 tons aggregate of submarines.

The aircraft carrier is intended to replace the Langley, and it is permissible to replace this at any time.

All of our destroyers are over age, with the exception of three 570 tons, which will become over age before December 31, 1936, and may be replaced now. The destroyer proportion, built (under age), building and projected tonnages after the N.R.A. construction was authorized is in the ratio of 10 for the United States; 17.6 for the British Empire; and 21.5 for Japan.

Most of our submarines are either over age or nearing the age limit. At present of the 81 submarines on the Navy list, 36 are over age, and on December 31, 1936, only 18 will be under age. Submarines built (under age) building and projected tonnages after the N.R.A. construction was authorized, were in the ratio of 10 for the United States; 9.6 for the British Empire; and 17.5 for Japan.

It will be seen from the above that if the announced policy of the United States is to be carried out, then this bill should pass. In the event that it failed to pass, it would indicate to the world that the Congress of the United States is not prepared to adopt the policy of having a navy built up to the existing treaty and second to none, in accordance with the request of the President and the naval administration. Such announcement would be a great set-back to the furtherance of some agreement that might be made in the future toward limitation of armament.

However, the United States, through this bill further announces that the President is authorized and empowered to suspend so much of the naval construction authorized by this act as may be necessary to bring the naval armament of the United States within any limitation agreed upon by the other nations and itself. The door is not closed by the United States in announcing its building program, but, on the contrary, is specifically left open to show our good faith in any agreement for the limitation of naval armaments that may be decided upon in the future.

In conclusion, I wish to say that the main purpose of this bill from an internal standpoint is to try to level off the building of our Navy over a 5-year period and to equalize expenditures. By so doing, better results will be obtained in every way, better ships will be built, and the total expenditure will be less. Congress cannot afford to put itself before the people of the country in an unfavorable light by not building up to the treaty strength and thereby providing an insurance against disaster. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN].

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, in the report that accompanies this bill the gentleman from Georgia says:

> Prior to the Washington Conference in 1921 the United States possessed a naval force, built and building, which was stronger than any other naval power.

From the time of that conference until June 30, 1933, we spent on our Navy more than $4,270,000,000. In each of these years, except one, we spent more than Great Britain, usually substantially more. In each of those years we spent two or three times as much as Japan spent on her navy. Yet the gentleman from Georgia, if he is correctly quoted, in a signed article in a Washington newspaper, refers to our course since 1921 as a "policy of disarmament by example", which he fears is a menace to world peace.

I doubt that there are 25 Members of this House who are capable of following this debate into terms of battleships, cruisers, tonnage, and so forth. But we can follow it in terms of dollars and cents. And some of the vital facts involved are these: Since we have been setting this example of disarmament with a menace to the peace of the world we have spent more than four and a quarter billion dollars on our Navy, Great Britain has spent a sum far less, and Japan's expenditures are not nearly half of ours. We have spent and continue to spend each year more money on our Navy than any other nation ever has spent in peace times in all history. If we are still inadequately prepared, what has become of these four and a quarter billion dollars? If we appropriate another billion dollars this year, what assurance have we that they will produce better results?

Let us consider a few recent years.

In the 3 fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, the United States spent more than a billion dollars on its Navy. And they tell us our Navy is inefficient and over age.

In those 3 years we spent on our Navy one billion fifty-nine million and some odd money to give us in 1934 an over age, insufficient navy. Great Britain spent in the same years $776,000,000 on her navy, and they tell us hers is efficient. In those 3 years Japan spent only $381,000,000 on her navy, and they tell us Japan is a menace to us on the high seas.

In 3 years Great Britain has spent less than three fourths as much as we, Japan has spent little more than one third as much as we, yet today they tell us that the navies of Great Britain and of Japan are efficient and up to date while ours is over age and dangerously weak.

In the past 3 years we have spent $60,000,000 more on our Navy than France, Italy, and Japan combined have spent on their navies.

Can the supporters of this bill tell us why these stupendous outlays on the American Navy have had the meager results they allege while other nations have supposedly built efficient navies at amazingly less cost?

A few days ago this House passed a naval appropriations bill amounting to $293,000,000. That sum alone is twice as much as our Navy ever cost us in peace or war in any year before 1917. Yet the Public Works Administration has added $276,000,000 for our Navy, and now in this bill we are asked to add $470,000,000 more. If the naval appropriations bill and this bill become law, there will have been appropriated and allotted to the American Navy this year $1,039,000,000.

And what is the excuse for this? Preparedness. Preparedness against whom? Not against Great Britain, for the most jingoistic isolationist will not have the temerity to say Great Britain is a danger to Uncle Sam. Then it is against Japan, for Japan is the only other nation that has a navy that is a patching on ours. Apparently Japan gets so much out of expending $381,000,000 on her navy during 3 years that we must appropriate $1,039,000,000 in 1 year for our Navy to get ready for her.

In 1902, as a boy I heard Richmond P. Hobson, the Spanish War hero, make a speech against Japan. So great an impression did it make on me that I remember it as if it had been made a few months ago. He told us then, as they tell us now, that we are to have war with far-away, little Japan. He said that war was not 25 years in the distance, nor 15 years, nor 10 years. Dramatically he came closer until he said "that war is so close that our utmost efforts cannot prepare us adequately for it." That was 32 years ago. The war has not come, but the jingos and militarists still use it as a hobgoblin with which to frighten us. It is not without significance that while these great appropriation measures are before Congress some newspapers are filled with Japanese war scares.

For years the United States has spent more money on its Army and Navy each year than any other nation has ever spent in peace times since the dawn of history. Yet we are asked to believe we are unprepared. If we are unprepared, it cannot be for lack of appropriations.

The naval appropriations bill, the P.W.A. allotment, and now the Vinson bill would commit our Nation in 1 year to expenditures of $1,039,000,000 on our Navy. And no one who follows events imagines that even that staggering sum would satisfy the Navy people a year or two hence.

Let us translate this huge sum into terms of useful things. Throughout our land are small colleges that have produced great men and good citizens. Five hundred thousand dollars would endow one of them and save it to carry on its good work. Our proposed naval appropriations for this year alone would endow for all time 2,078 such colleges.

The whole land wants good roads. In my part of the country they build 18-foot concrete pavement at $20,000 a mile. Our proposed naval appropriations this year would build 51,950 miles of such pavement. That is equal to 16 paved highways from New York City to San Francisco.

Scores of hospitals and schools could be endowed for a fraction of this $1,039,000,000.

Since the Washington Conference we have spent more than four and one quarter billion dollars on our Navy. And, by the way, in the same period we spent nearly $5,000,000,000 on our Army. And still, after spending over $9,000,000,000 on Army and Navy, we are not prepared for war, they say.

If we drained the Treasury of every dollar and exhausted the credit of the Nation in Army and Navy expenditures, it would not satisfy the preparers. All history teaches the lesson that huge military establishments lead to national ruin. Science and invention, with the menace of war with gas, disease germs, and electrocution, warn us that no one knows what "the next war" may be or how to prepare for or against it.

Let us scale down these inordinate, bankrupting appropriations for war. If we want to spend some of the savings, let us use them to prepare for peace—an effort that has not had much Government support in recent years. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD].

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, as one of the younger men in point of service, not in age, on the Naval Affairs Committee, it would be presumptuous on my part to try to add anything to what has been said by our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], and the former distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN]. Our committee held hearings on this bill, and we bring it before the House with the unanimous report of the committee.

Prior to the Washington Conference in 1921 the United States possessed a naval force, built and building, which was stronger than any other naval power. As a contribution to world peace, we agreed to scrap 11 battleships and battle cruisers building and 20 completed battleships. No other nation has made any such contribution toward the cause of disarmament. Within the space of 10 years Great Britain, as the report shows, provided for 134 new combatant ships, Japan 130, France 166, and Italy 115. By contrast, Mr. Chairman, the United States provided for but 34.

Instead of maintaining our strength and ratio in modern ships as agreed upon, we have fallen well behind in the latter category—that is, in the light cruisers, destroyers, and submarines.

This bill definitely fixes the strength of the Navy in each category after the tonnage followed by the Washington and London Conferences and authorizes the President to undertake immediately the construction of the necessary new and replacement vessels, and also authorizes Congress to make the necessary appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, the adoption of a definite naval policy will permit an orderly building program in the future. Such a building program will not only be more economical but will also contribute to better design, better workmanship, and less disruption of naval industry and will keep the national defense on a higher level than is possible under old methods of building a navy. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that I am 100 percent for national defense in every line—on land, on sea, and in the air. I am 100 percent for this bill, H.R. 6604.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Will the gentleman from New York yield for a question?

Mr. BRITTEN. What question has the gentleman in mind?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I should like to ask this question: The gentleman who has just spoken said there were numerous hearings before the committee, that the question had been studied and the gentleman recited the number of battleships that had been built, and so on. In all of these hearings and in all of these discussions was the question of the advisability of battleships in time of war discussed in the light of their inability to communicate with one another and be of service?

The CHAIRMAN. Is this to be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; it will be taken out of my time. The gentleman from New York has just yielded back 2 minutes and we will use that now if the distinguished Chairman will permit.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I asked the question of the gentleman who just spoke.

Mr. BRITTEN. And he has just asked me if I would not be good enough to answer the gentleman from Connecticut.

During the past 20 years the question of communication between first-line ships has been discussed in every detail. The bill before the House at the present moment has nothing whatever to do with battleships, and, in fact, the bill does not even include first- or second-line cruisers. It only includes destroyers, submarines, and one plane carrier.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. But the gentleman knows that when I referred to battleships I had reference to anything afloat that is used for offensive or defensive purposes, and they must have some means of communication. These ships that the gentleman speaks of need means of communication in order to be used offensively or to be of any use in time of war.

There have been so many instances of failure of communication that during the World War these ships were discarded and not used except as convoys in the transportation of soldiers to go to Europe; and the President of the United States lately made the statement that soldiers would be kept on our own territory in the future, therefore in the event of another war they will be useless.

Mr. BRITTEN. I congratulate the gentleman on his speech, but I do not know what his question is. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. The question is one of communication between ships.

Mr. BRITTEN. I will answer the gentleman by saying that I think the American Navy is ahead of the world on communication at sea from ship to ship or ship to shore.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. But the question I ask is, in the light of the evidence that they cannot communicate, what is the advisability of using ships of this kind in time of war?

Mr. BRITTEN. In the light of what the gentleman says, he is in darkness—complete darkness.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. And I may say for the information of the gentlemen on the committee that so are the ships in time of war, in complete darkness, as well as useless.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is entirely mistaken, and if he will read the hearings or go down to the Navy Department and ask the question seriously, which I am sure he intends here, he will get all the information he wants and will be convinced that our ships are not in darkness, but that successful communication is maintained constantly 24 hours out of every 24 hours from ship to ship and ship to shore, every day in the week.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Ask the Navy officials? Why not the gentleman from Illinois? The Navy has always answered questions calling for more and more money and ships.

Mr. BRITTEN. I must confess I do not know what the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Which emphasizes the gentleman's lack of knowledge on questions of intership communication.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I clipped from a magazine published last week a brief statement that was made by the First Lady of the Land to a group of women in Washington, D.C., on the subject, the Cause and Cure of War. The First Lady had this to say:

> I believe anyone who thinks must think of the next war as they would of suicide, but most people don't think. How deadly stupid we are.

With that as a text, I am going to be like Ishmael in the wilderness today, because someone must raise his voice in behalf of peace, and I can do it sincerely because I believe in peace, albeit I believe in and can support the program that is laid down in this bill by the Naval Affairs Committee.

My remarks may not be strictly to the substance of the bill, but they are provoked by the expenditure that is therein requested. While the bill as such is quite all right, Mr. Chairman, we do not go far enough in a bill of this kind because we do not implement our efforts in behalf of war and preparedness with some equally affirmative effort in behalf of peace. How often we give lip service to this beautiful ideal that we call universal peace, and how many Members will come into the well of this House and say that a large navy is the best insurance of and for universal peace and drop further effort in that direction?

I agree that it is some insurance or assurance of peace, but it is negative, and, as a matter of fact, does not make a complete program; nor will it be complete until we have done something affirmative to bring about the establishment of justice and understanding in the channels of international affairs. How, then, Mr. Chairman, are we going to arrive at that point of international understanding by virtue of which we shall ultimately relegate to "limbo" the arbitrament of human differences by means of the sword? [Applause.]

I would pertinently submit this query to the Committee: How many in this Chamber this afternoon have ever seen a man die upon the battlefield? How many have ever seen men lying on the field of carnage, with the picture of excruciating pain upon their faces, with that glassy look that is the precursor of death stealing into the eyes, languishing in the horrible throes of death, and oftentimes imploring their fellow comrades by saying, "My God! please, oh please, put me out of this misery with a bullet"? How many have ever seen that spectacle? It is a poignant lesson for peace.

Mr. Chairman, if anyone had wanted a lesson in behalf of peace, if anyone here needed something to stimulate the desire for peace, you could have had it when you saw men die at Chateau-Thierry, in the Argonne, in the St. Mihiel, or in any other of the engagements of the World War.

I think of still another picture that forcibly directs the attention to the need for militant efforts for peace. I think of the contingent of gold-star mothers who were sent to France by the United States Government. I can envision these blessed mothers, whose hearts have been bruised and lacerated beyond all repair, whose sons were taken away, coming to the portals of the cemetery at Romagne or Suresnes, or one of the other American cemeteries in France, under the leadership of some American officer detailed for that purpose. I see these groups of mothers disintegrate; see some go here and some go there, searching earnestly, intently, eagerly for some spot more blessed than all the rest; and then each for herself suddenly espies a white marble cross on which she reads the name of a beloved son. I see her read and reread the name; I see her look at this, the last resting place of her boy; I see her tears commingle with the dust of the last resting place of her beloved son, reverently stooping over his shrine, then let all the anguish of the human heart melt into her tears as she breathes reverently, "My son, my son." Is there not a lesson, an incentive, some impelling force for universal peace in that anguished moment? Then why do we fail to do something in that direction?

Three hundred and eighty million dollars to be expended under the authority conferred in this bill! A staggering amount, and yet, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the program therein laid down, and for a definite reason. I do not believe a large navy is an incentive for war any more than that an adequate well-disciplined police force is an incentive to crime. But when we have built a treaty-strength Navy and provided an adequate Army, we stop right there without implementing these defensive weapons with something to bring about better international understanding and the development of a peace consciousness.

Day after day we prattle here, uttering a lot of balderdash and pretty nothings about the greedy and avaricious spirit of foreign nations. Have we tried to bring about understanding except by villifying and abusing them? Before we can well boast of our efforts toward the abolition of war we must exercise the duty incumbent upon us as well as upon all other nations to bring about justice and proper understanding by affirmative effort.

It seems strange that we should be so avid for trade, so desirous to get our share of French francs without also securing French understanding, that we should want our share of German marks without being particularly mindful of the marks of German esteem and respect, that we should want our share of Italian liras and not the lyrics of Italian harmony and concord, that we should want our share of the pound sterling without overly much regard for the sterling spirit of amity and peace that should attend it.

Moral and economic considerations are and must be inextricably bound up together, if there is to be a basis for the insight and understanding that is the foundation for a lasting peace. Yet we freely approach this task of authorizing the expenditure of three hundred and eighty millions for adequate naval preparedness without giving so much as momentary consideration to the fact that peace, like war, is the product of affirmative effort.

The privilege of saying something in behalf of this cherished ideal of peace provokes a most personal allusion. Doubtless many of you gentlemen in this Chamber this afternoon are the fathers of sons who are now in high school. I recall distinctly that about 4 years after the superintendent of schools handed me that sheepskin indicating that I was a graduate of high school, I found myself in a uniform in the armed forces of Uncle Sam. This same thing can happen to your sons, even as it happened to me and those of my generation.

Is it, then, something edifying or ennobling to look forward to a day when a few years after your son has received his diploma from high school you shall find him in a uniform, ready, if necessary, to be offered as a sacrifice upon the altar of democracy? If we can but see the utter personal attributes of this problem, perhaps we today might as we pass this bill give thought to the problems of peace and the need for action.

How often we hear speakers mount to the rostrum on patriotic occasions and indulge in the very sentimentality which they so often ascribe to those who lift their voices in behalf of peace by discoursing upon the beauty of sacrifice in the cause of the Nation? I quarrel not with that sentiment, but I insist that such platitudes are small comfort and consolation for any gold-star mother whose heart has been bruised and torn by the death of a son, flesh of her flesh, and blood of her blood. Only the mothers will know.

Mention has been made of the propaganda efforts of churches or church councils. I speak for no church, although I am a church member. I am sorry that my distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] had to ridicule the idea of anybody's belonging to a church and being a pacifist or of being identified with the Federal Council of Churches and not being sincere in his efforts for peace.

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not misinterpret what I said. I do not refer to anybody belonging to any church or to the churches themselves. In fact, I am a strong advocate of church attendance. I did ridicule, however, this particular organization and its secretary, who would seek to convey to the House the impression that all the churches of the country affiliated with the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America are opposed to this bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is it not quite possible that the secretary was indicating what might have been done in the form of a resolution.

Mr. BRITTEN. Not at all; not in this instance, and that is what I complain about.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not wish to misinterpret my colleague in any way.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. While on the question of sacrifices, we cannot, of course, amend this bill, but do you not think it is about time we pass a law, the minute we enter into a war, that will take the profit out of the manufacture of war materials?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. We would not have quite so many wars if we took the profit out of it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Now, just suppose for a moment that I should introduce a bill asking for $50,000 to be set aside to create the office of an Under Secretary of Peace in the Department of State, together with the necessary clerical force, to coordinate all peace activity, give it governmental sanction, and to do something to gather up information that will bring about a spirit of understanding and justice with foreign nations. How far would that bill get even if it sought but a niggardly $50,000? The Director of the Budget would say, "We are sorry, but that will unbalance the Budget." The committee chairman would say, "We are sorry, but you cannot have $50,000." Yet that $50,000 represents the cost of only two airplanes under this bill.

Mr. McFARLANE. Only one.

Mr. DIRKSEN. One, the gentleman from Texas suggests, and he may be right. It represents a small fraction of the cost of a single marine authorized under this bill or of a single destroyer. Is it asking too much? Gentlemen, we have to implement these war measures—and they are war measures, at least preparedness for war in the future with equally aggressive efforts for peace. Look at the roster of the State Department and examine all the different officers and divisions and sections and you will not find a single division there that constitutes an agency of the United States Government to act affirmatively for peace. How strange that unofficial organizations from California to New York must undertake that sort of thing without any militant and aggressive aid on the part of the United States Government. Have we not been weak there? I am no pacifist. I belong to two patriotic organizations and heartily subscribe to their defense programs, but I am no jingo either. I prefer to take a stand and do my little part so that in the future I can honestly and sincerely say that I have done some little thing to bring about that understanding that is so necessary, so that nations will no longer arbitrate their differences by strewing the green fields of various nations with the bodies of young, living, pulsing manhood. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BURNHAM].

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] just remarked that he is no pacifist. Let me say that I am a pacifist. I am a pacifist to the extent that I abhor war. For that reason I believe we should be prepared at all times with a strong national defense to preserve peace and to prevent war.

This bill H.R. 6604, as has already been explained, does not provide for any increase in the ships of the Navy, but simply provides for the orderly replacement of already existing ships when they have passed beyond the age of effective usefulness and are no longer capable of meeting in battle newer ships of more recent design with any prospect of success in such a meeting. For the next few years the replacements required will be almost entirely confined to the light forces, the destroyers and submarines.

I have the honor to represent the district in which is located the base at San Diego, from which the majority of our light forces operate. Having for years had the opportunity of observing these ships in their daily and nightly operations, in their upkeep and maintenance, in their every activity, I feel that I am perhaps qualified to comment, for your information, upon the desirability and necessity of this bill that we now have under consideration.

Every destroyer that we have in commission is of hurried war-time construction and has already reached the age where not one could be classed as an effective, useful unit of the fleet. With each passing year the burden of keeping these boats in even an operating condition becomes heavier and heavier. Each year the expense of upkeep is greater, more time is required to effect repairs, the burden of which falls largely upon the personnel of the ships themselves. Consequently the crews have less time for their training, for torpedo and gunnery practices, and naturally, owing to this, are decreased in efficiency as fighting units.

To be perfectly frank, these ships have already served their life of usefulness and are worn out, as all things must wear out in time. But they must be retained in service because we have no others to take their places.

God grant that our first line of defense, the Navy, may never again be called upon to defend our country or commerce against an enemy; but if that not impossible contingency should arise, it is the solemn duty of this body to provide that the men of our Navy are not forced to go to sea in worn-out, obsolete ships to face an enemy in powerful modern ones.

Gentlemen, our western coastal trade routes extend from the Straits of Juan de Fuca south to the Panama Canal, a distance of 4,000 miles, and westward to Hawaii, another 2,000 miles. This mighty and wealthy country cannot afford to intrust the defense of those trade routes and the defense of our shores to ships that are not as fast, as powerful, and as efficient in every way as those of any other nation in the world.

There is another highly important phase to the provisions of this bill. The recent highly laudable building program which the Congress and the President inaugurated, has done wonders in initiating an upward movement from the depression of business and industry for which we have all been so earnestly striving. Every State in the Union has benefited from that building, for every State in the Union supplies raw materials or manufactured articles that go into those ships. Labor, not only in the actual construction work, but in the supply of material, all over the United States has benefited immensely. The shipbuilding industry, doubtless the hardest hit of any industry during the depression, has been revived in the East at least, and the wheels have again been started in the shipyards. Unfortunately, because the shipbuilding industry in the West was in such a deplorable condition, the private yards of the west coast did not participate in the benefits as did those in the East.

However, if this bill is enacted, and the necessary building is undertaken to replace our obsolete ships, our vitally important shipbuilding industry will be more generally revived and stabilized.

In conclusion, I firmly believe the will of the overwhelming majority of the American people is that the United States build and maintain a navy second to none on this globe. This is a peaceful but not a supine nation. The people of this Nation never have allowed and never will allow the rights or interests of our citizens at home or abroad to be trampled upon.

We are not an aggressor nation. The Navy needs no war to justify its existence. Its activities are of inestimable value to this Nation in time of peace, and I am whole-heartedly in favor of this bill. I am in favor of a strong national defense.

The passage of this bill is but implementing a policy that has prevailed since the foundation of our Nation. It was George Washington who said, observe faith and justice with all nations, cultivate peace and harmony with all; but, my friends, he also said, in time of peace prepare for war, and I believe that the greatest insurance for peace and against war is to be prepared at all times to fight like Trojans and defend our shores and our homes against invasion by an alien foe. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested this afternoon when the present Chairman of this Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Texas, was arguing against a $5,000 appropriation for an investigation, with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN]. I believe in reasonable economy. I am very glad to see it in practice but I thought, here are some military tacticians who have taken off the floor today the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and placed him in the distinguished position of Chairman of this Committee of the Whole. He cannot have any voice on this bill that proposes an appropriation of over $470,000,000, and nearly a billion dollars when you get the parity battleships and cruisers that are provided in the treaty, because this is only piecemeal. Let me suggest further that the House passed last week a naval bill carrying $297,000,000, and, I understand, over $250,000,000 more is provided for naval purposes. That carries, with the bill before us, over a billion dollars, and that wild naval program is submitted to the House. Congress is for national defense. Every Member is for reasonable protection, but shipbuilding companies, munition manufacturers, navy yards, and other interests behind these extravagant war measures are pressing Congress harder than ever before in times of peace. I congratulate the distinguished Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Texas, who occupies the seat he does now, with his efforts for economy, that he is not thrown into this controversy. [Laughter and applause.]

We have spent in the last 5 years over $1,800,000,000, as I will disclose by actual figures, in the regular Navy appropriation bill. I will put the figures in the RECORD for each recent year. We have appropriated over $800,000,000 every year recently for the Army and Navy, and yet Army officers and Navy officers come before committees and say we are dangerously below proper protection and in need of vast appropriations. This Government spends more than any other country in the world, but these experts say we need more. This Government is unprotected, according to those who represent this tremendously extravagant policy for taxpayers' money that largely goes to contractors.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. No; I regret I cannot yield now. Now, we are all for preparedness. There is not a man on this floor but who believes in sufficient preparedness, but I have shown you the figures we have spent. That is the money of the taxpayers we are spending today. In addition to that, here is another proposition eventually calling for nearly a billion dollars more. I am for airplanes. Do not mistake me. I believe a thousand more airplanes would be useful, but the present program is without precedent. I answered the gentleman who is now in the chair, this morning, when he spoke about airplanes we had during the last war. We spent over $500,000,000 for airplanes, and we never got one battle or pursuit airplane to fight on the western front. We had only some flying coffins, 270 of them. I know that, because I was chairman of the committee before which the Secretary of War testified to that fact.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. In just a moment. I cannot yield now.

I admire the leader on this side, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN]. I saw him stand on this floor in 1917, fighting as best he could, and a very strong man he is in the midst of a fight. That was when the war proposition was being considered by the House. I supported him as best I could in that fight. He made the statement then that not 10 percent of the people of the United States were in favor of our entrance into that World War. I believed he spoke the truth. I am convinced of that fact now. He offered further on that day an amendment that there should be no man sent from the United States to Europe or Africa or Asia, as he put it, and he offered the resolution as an amendment to the declaration of war, and it was voted down at that time. Thereafter this country conscripted millions of our boys to fight Europe's battles. He is a man of courage, my friend, Mr. BRITTEN. He spoke the truth. Whether I agree with him at all times or not, I admire him because of his courage.

I have offered a resolution and presented it to the House year after year which provides that the United States shall not go into a foreign war until the people have the right to vote whether or not Congress shall declare war. Of course, the President can put twenty or forty million men in a war against invasion, so we have no danger from invasion. But I have offered a resolution, and presented it again at this session, that only by a plebiscite, only by a popular vote first cast, should we declare a foreign war. This would be under a constitutional amendment. Also, that no soldier should be sent by conscription to Europe to fight any more battles. [Applause.] I believe in it. Send your boy if you dare! Send your boy! Men who were on that Military Affairs Committee came to me in 1917 and said, "For God's sake, I cannot vote for this war because I have got boys that I do not want to send." Of course, they did not. The greatest treasure you have in the world is your child. Yet men who voted for that war did it because of propaganda. They were just as sincere as I was. What did you get out of the war? I am looking at men who were veterans here—splendid soldiers they were.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Discredited, as we have been by every nation of Europe, repudiated by France and by these other governments, to whom we loaned $11,000,000,000 for war munitions, during the last 5 years we have spent three times, or over $1,800,000,000, what France has spent for her navy; more than three times what Japan has spent for her navy, yet we are in effect sending a signal to the world, "Japan, come and meet the challenge, if you will. Great Britain, France, Italy, come and meet the challenge, if you will." And Great Britain will not meet it, because she wants this Navy to help her in the next war.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I cannot yield, because my time is limited. I will tell you, if you want an answer to your inquiry about limiting profits in war, you cannot draw a bill that cannot be set aside during war to take the profits out of war. I was chairman of an investigating committee, and I know all about the impossibility of controlling profits. The Constitution is wiped out during the war. Anything will be spent to win the war. I have not the time to argue the question. I wish I had, because peace plans are of little value during war.

My friends, that is all I have to say, particularly, along this line. I was asked to speak on the plebiscite because I had introduced my resolution for a constitutional amendment to so provide.

The gentleman from Illinois spoke a few moments ago about a military company with which he was connected. A company which I organized in my town when I came out of the Regular Army was in the last war. That company lost 88 men killed or died in France, more than were lost by all the American Navy put together. So I speak with some knowledge of fatalities. The gentleman from California [Mr. BURNHAM] just spoke. He speaks of submarines and other small vessels in his harbor. When I was in San Diego, I saw nearly a hundred of those boats rusting in the harbor and of no value. General Mitchell said before my committee he could drop a single bomb and destroy a battleship. That is the situation. Why are we to build a great Navy like we are proposing to build? What is the purpose? Are we at war? Not at all. This bill does not tell you how much you are going to spend. Someone said, "Why, it is only an authorization." Yes; but when an authorization comes, the Committee on Appropriations considers that a direction. So does the President of the United States. I want a good Navy. I want a good defense. We have it in the United States, not alone with the Regular Army, but we have a National Guard, and when the National Guard of Wisconsin and Michigan were thrown into the war they had 13,000 casualties in the Thirty-second Division. They were thrown in as shock troops. So do not pay attention to some of these war statements by so-called "experts" that are made to you, not that they would be dishonest, but sometimes they forget.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. FREAR. Let me say I have served with my distinguished friend, Mr. BRITTEN, when the war proposition was being considered. I think there are only four Republicans in the House now who were here then. Although I have differed with my colleague occasionally, I never will forget the fight he made on this floor during the war. When war comes, you are just swamped with propaganda on all sides. I had telegrams a foot high from many banks. What did the banks know about it. They read, "Follow the General Staff bill." That is what they said—all propaganda.

We will have it again unless we have a plebiscite that permits the American people to determine whether we shall have a foreign war. In the matter of defense from outside aggression, I would give the President all the power he needs; and he has it under the Constitution in any event.

Again I say, I am glad our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Texas, is in the chair during the consideration of this bill. I submit a few statistics that have an important bearing on this bill and like expenditures:

IN PEACE TIMES WE TOP THE WORLD IN WAR EXPENDITURES

We have recently been expending annually over $800,000,000 for military and naval war bills, more than double what the taxpayers of this country were paying prior to the World War, as shown by the accompanying table:

	Army	Navy	Total
1916	$164,635,577	$155,029,426	$319,665,003
1926	355,072,226	312,743,410	667,815,636
1927	360,808,777	318,909,096	679,717,873
1928	390,540,803	331,335,492	721,876,295
1929	416,901,546	364,561,544	781,463,090
1930	453,524,973	374,165,639	827,690,612
1931	478,418,974	354,071,004	832,489,978
1933	462,239,701	357,436,995	819,676,696

Figures taken from the World Almanac of 1933 show an increase in 15 years of total Army and naval expenditures of more than 266 percent and 1934 will reach far over a billion dollars for war preparations, or more than 25 percent of ordinary Budget expenditures.

Pressure for a greater army and bigger navy is to be urged on Congress next session, which reminds us of the admonition of Historian Abbott, who says:

"In all despotic governments it is necessary * * * to have a powerful military force."

That warning against despots, and wars waged by despots, is observed in war when a military despotism is all powerful in our own Government. Since the Constitution was adopted repudiating despotism, pressure has constantly been exercised on Congress by military and naval interests through misleading and half-truth comparisons to show that, although spending more than any other country for national defense, we are practically defenseless. The purpose is apparent, and if at all honest reflects gross waste of funds by our war experts.

Study in this connection the following expenditures for naval purposes alone by the five principal powers, taken from the World Almanac, 1933:

	Great Britain	United States	France	Italy	Japan
1928	£58,123,257	$356,597,546	$98,046,348	$57,589,000	$128,203,000
1929	57,300,000	364,233,362	101,600,000	60,021,000	131,222,000
1930	55,865,000	378,879,067
1931	51,739,000	375,291,828	137,516,120	80,795,701	131,468,844
1932	$273,397,800	357,906,219	118,970,598	84,569,254	105,437,569
		1,832,718,022	456,123,066	282,974,955	496,331,413
Annual average, approximately	$276,000,000	366,543,603	91,224,613	56,594,991	99,266,283
Also for 1932-33	£56,476,360	318,906,141	94,823,500	80,947,264	246,941,797

Draw your own conclusions from these war preparations in times of peace.

Forty million active and reserve soldiers, according to the same authority, including 4,000,000 "selected" soldiers in this country, are in readiness for the next world war and add enormously to war-preparedness costs.

A feverish race has been on with naval expenditures during the past 5 years, of which the United States contributed $1,832,718,022, to which we are asked further to build a billion-dollar-parity Navy, for more American battleships to be used in naval target practice. Obsolete $40,000,000 battleships, Mitchell, airman, declared might be sunk with a single bomb, but they make good targets and furnish large profits to shipbuilders. And in this mad race for war expenditures taxpayers have no voice or consideration.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KNIFFIN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KNIFFIN].

Mr. KNIFFIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I wish to ask a question.

Mr. KNIFFIN. I yield.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I served for a good many years on this committee. I remember distinctly that we prepared a plan with respect to what is known as an airplane deck cruiser with the thought that if this type were adopted and we could carry bombing planes on it, we might be able to do away with the necessity of having airplane carriers. Has the committee at this time in contemplation the construction of one ship of this type?

Mr. KNIFFIN. I may say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that it is my understanding that we can scrap the Langley at any time and build a ship of the type he mentions.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KNIFFIN. I cannot yield much of my time as I only have 15 minutes, but I yield in this instance to my friend, the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman knows I have spent many hours' time in the last 10 years on the Naval Affairs Committee. I, too, have been greatly interested in the projected airplane-deck cruiser. I understood that an agreement has been reached among the naval powers of the world that a ship of this kind would not be classed as a carrier but as a cruiser. I, too, should like to know what our Navy is doing toward the construction of ships of this character.

Mr. KNIFFIN. I may say to the gentleman that only recently this matter was discussed with our committee by the Chief of Naval Operations. He maintains that there is some question as to whether or not such a ship would be classed as a carrier.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KNIFFIN. I am sorry; I cannot yield further now. I will yield later if I have time.

Mr. Chairman, after having listened last week to two most informative speeches on the subject of national defense, one by the able and distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], and the other by the alert and thoroughly well-informed former chairman of that great committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], I am sure the Membership of this House can well appreciate the feeling of timidity with which I rise before you for the purpose of discussing briefly the pending bill, which is essentially a national-defense measure.

As a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, last fall I made an inspection trip of various of our naval shore stations and bases on both coasts and spent some time with the fleet in the Pacific. During the course of that trip I flew in naval and Marine Corps scouting and bombing planes, was on surface ships of every category, and made submerged runs at sea in submarines, and feel that I acquired much practical knowledge concerning our naval stations and the fleet. I have no thought of attempting to discuss in detail the matter of my observations made during that trip. In view of the business before the House this afternoon, I feel that I should say, however, that there is a most noticeable difference between ships of war-time construction and the later and more modern types. The thing that impressed me most of all was the efficient and painstaking manner in which the Government's great naval properties are being cared for by the officers and enlisted men of the Navy. There is no question but that our naval officers are consecrating their lives to the proper and faithful performance of the great responsibility that is committed to them.

Before proceeding further I desire to emphasize that I am an ardent advocate of peace. I consider war to be the most futile and ferocious of all human follies. This generation knows something of the futility and evil consequences of war. In this country our greatest men have all been earnest advocates of peace. The Father of Our Country, George Washington, when making reference to war, said that it was a plague to mankind and that he hoped that it might soon be banished from the earth. Again, that great general said:

> We have experienced enough of its evils in this country to know that it should not be wantonly or carelessly entered upon.

Lincoln, on his deathbed, at the threshold of eternity, uttered that touching and fervent aspiration that the mighty scourge of war might speedily pass away. McKinley hoped to avoid the war that came in his time. Theodore Roosevelt favored the arbitration of all questions that could not be settled by diplomatic negotiations. President Wilson was tireless in his efforts for peace and finally ensued it on the field of battle. You all know what Sherman said about war. General Grant's most famous utterance, the one that will linger longest in the memory of men, was the prayer of his war-weary heart, "Let us have peace." And I am sure that we can all agree that our great President now in the White House is a stanch advocate of peace.

I, for one, have hoped for 15 or 20 years that there might be effected some system of international justice or perhaps an agreement between nations that would permanently promote world peace and eliminate the savagery of war and its painful effects upon civilization.

We in America are a peace-loving people. We have attained our present standard of greatness because we are a peace-loving people. We believe in drastic disarmament as a method of peace. Since the advent of the World War we have hoped and prayed from year to year that something worth while in this direction might be accomplished. We have set the example. We have disarmed on land and surrendered our place on the sea. We wanted less naval strength than the nations demanded. We did our part and should at all times continue to hold ourselves in readiness to join quickly in any good-faith movement among nations designed to drastically reduce armaments. It is to be regretted, however, that after all these years of persistent effort in good faith on our part to bring about world peace, we now find the world crowded with selfishness and greed, and hundreds of millions of the people of the earth suffering from unrest and revolution.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so long as other nations continue to threaten the peace of the world by building up their armies and navies, we must necessarily make proper provision for our national defense. At least until it becomes clearly evident that peace will prevail we are compelled to do so. The great wealth and the inexhaustible resources of our country should constitute a guaranty that proper facilities will be provided for our safety; and, in this connection, it should be carefully borne in mind that ordinarily war ruins the participants, and especially does it have that effect upon the vanquished.

In attempting to look after the matter of our own welfare by building a treaty-strength Navy we in this country are not prompted—I repeat—we are not prompted by a desire to assume an attitude of superiority. No, indeed; because it is now, and always will be, to our interest to avoid war. All we want is to be left alone; and we want this badly enough that we must have facilities that will guarantee that we will not be molested. The enactment of the pending measure, the Vinson bill, will afford to our people that much-desired assurance.

The Navy is commonly referred to as our first line of national defense. With all due respect to the Navy, its fine traditions, and its splendid officer and enlisted personnel, I cannot subscribe to that view. The only possible way in which our national defense may be built up and maintained in proper condition is by acts of Congress. I therefore prefer to believe that Congress is the first line of our defense. The Navy becomes our first line of defense, of course, after war is declared.

The Constitution of the United States enjoins upon the Congress the responsibility of providing for the common defense. That provision is of so great importance that the framers of the Constitution made reference to it in the preamble. Congress, of course, is governed largely by the public pulse.

In times when the trend is toward pacificism, not much is done. In times when the trend is for the protection of our people and our national interests, more attention is paid to the subject. And, Mr. Chairman, at a time like this, during an era when tumult exists throughout the world, I am persuaded that a strong Navy in the hands of a great peace-loving people will help in the preservation of peace. There is one thing certain, however, and that is there will be no disposition on our part to become the aggressor. We have a brilliant record in that regard. This Nation has never as an aggressor entered upon a war, and there will be no disposition on our part to misuse a strong navy. Our peace-seeking record should challenge universal admiration.

During the late World War thousands of our fighting men had an opportunity to observe at close range how hideous is the face of war. Those who went into the trenches and heard the roar and the shriek of the whistling shells know something of the devastating effects of war.

Those that are still with us advocate peace, and at the same time they advocate strong defense facilities, so that thousands of the young men of this country will not on account of our unpreparedness be needlessly and ruthlessly sacrificed in the event of an emergency. If those who did not return from the western front could come to this floor today and give audible expression of their views and their sentiments, they would urge that the Congress of the United States promptly provide a full treaty strength Navy, both as an instrument of peace and protection. I think our duty is plain here today, and I am going to vote for this bill. In the light of world conditions, as they are known to exist, I feel that I can conscientiously do so. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back any part of my time that I did not use.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. McGRATH].

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, in every country right-thinking persons are trying to preserve the peace of the world. But to stop the terrors of war we must maintain an army and a navy ready and able to meet any emergency. War seldom gives advance notice. Navies cannot be built over night. Cruisers and airplanes in the blueprint stage might well be turned over to the Committee for the Disposal of Waste Executive Paper in the District of Columbia when war comes.

During the past 12 years, up to March 4, many in high places in our Government considered national defense and naval construction from the standpoint of European and Asiatic wishes. At the present time, thank God, when the Naval Affairs Committee thinks and acts with an eye single to American needs and American defense, we have the full cooperation of the President of the United States. We hold out friendly hands to every people on the earth, but we insist that American rights and American lives shall not be made mere pawns in an international diplomatic chess game.

In the next war the British Navy and allied armies may not be holding the line for 14 months when we are forced to enter the conflict. The United States of America must be able to meet any emergency in her own right and rely solely on her own strength. To rely on any possible help from an outside source would probably force us to make hasty alliances to save our faces.

We on the Pacific coast live on the frontier. The next war will be fought in our very homes. Our people may be the Belgium refugees. Fanciful? A joke? The Kaiser's army struck at Belgium because it was a feasible plan. The defense was not strong enough to repel invasion. Belgium paid the price. She left a glorious heritage, but that did not restore ruined homes, wrecked lives, or bring back the dead civilians.

We, ourselves, would never have been forced into the World War. Our rights would never have been trampled upon by either Central Powers or by the Allies if an adequately prepared Army and Navy had stood back of the protest of Woodrow Wilson.

When Lieutenant Commander McGinnis and his gallant crews of Navy flyers broke all records for sustained formation flights, surpassing even Balbo and his superb Italian flyers, they proved to the world, what we on the Pacific coast already knew, that Honolulu is but the next commuting station west of the California coast. Remember this as we pay tribute to our Navy aviators. The flight across the Pacific the next time may be an unfriendly flight from Honolulu to San Francisco unless adequate defense has made the Hawaiian Islands safe from such a possibility. We must not only forever hold those beautiful islands, but we owe it to ourselves so to fortify and protect their borders that the Hawaiian Islands will become the Gibraltar of the Pacific.

We, of the Pacific coast, know our Navy. We love them from the ranking admiral and the revered memory of Moffett and his men to the gob on leave. From San Diego, through the Golden Gate, and north to Bremerton and Seattle, the Pacific coast opens its arms and hearts. We stand ready to do our part, and, for them as well as for ourselves, we do not simply ask for, we respectfully but urgently insist upon, a Navy of full treaty strength—not at some distant time—but now. I support this bill as a sweeping step in the right direction.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON].

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, I was very much impressed this afternoon, as I always am, when the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] expressed his views. He always speaks with a sincerity that leaves no doubt as to the good intent which underlies any views he presents to the House. In strong language he has expressed to the House today his regret at the vast sums of money that have been expended in the last few years by this Nation in its effort to provide for our national security.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FREAR. It was not in a tone of regret. I state that we were spending much more than any other country in the world at the present time. This is in addition to the proposal that comes before us this afternoon.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Knowing as I do the patriotic influences that always actuate the gentleman from Wisconsin, I do not mean to infer that there is any regret upon his part from the standpoint of opposition by him to what had been expended, but regret from the standpoint that circumstances required this Nation to do so.

Why does America spend these millions of dollars in support of national defense? Is it not entirely due to the fact that America must do it as a matter of self-protection? I was likewise impressed this afternoon when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] painted for us a word picture of what he had seen with his own eyes at the Argonne, at Chateau-Thierry, and St. Mihiel. It is the thought of what was suffered by those who served on those fields of battle that prompts the American Legion to ask at our hands adequate national defense, and when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] spoke further as to the heart throbs of a mother at the loss of her son, he thereby gave the underlying reason that has prompted the Gold Star Mothers of this Nation time and again to go on record in favor of just such measures as the one which we have before us today. A measure that gives strength to our national defense and precludes the possibility of entering another war unprepared.

Someone spoke here today about this Nation spending twice as much for ships and defense as do foreign nations. I want to call the gentleman's attention, as well as the attention of the House, to the fact that to whatever extent we spend more we are compelled to do so because in constructing ships in America we pay wages that are twice as much as do any of the nations to which the gentleman has referred. [Applause.] And, for the same reason, the expense of maintaining our Navy is greater. We provide a better standard of living for our enlisted men. [Applause.]

Today France has an organized military force of 6,298,428, Italy 5,964,764, Russia over 5,000,000, Spain 2,329,000, Poland nearly 2,000,000, Rumania nearly 2,000,000, Czechoslovakia more than 1,500,000, and Yugoslavia 1,500,000.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield for a correction, because I know the gentleman would not want to make a misstatement?

I have been in Russia and in practically all of the countries the gentleman has referred to. The gentleman is including in his figures those who have had military experience and are subject to call and not the regular army in existence now.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I have not been to Russia——

Mr. FREAR. I have been in Russia, as well as the other countries referred to.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I have taken the figures which I have given from authentic sources against which I think nothing can be said.

Mr. FREAR. Tchitcherin told me they had 650,000 and France 750,000, referring to those under arms.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I hope, for the sake of America, that the gentleman's figures about Russia would apply equally to the other nations.

Mr. FREAR. They apply to France and the other countries.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I was referring to organized military forces. I will speak further of this matter at greater length before I have finished.

The purpose of the bill now under consideration is to increase the strength of our naval forces and thereby provide more adequately for our national defense.

The desire for peace is the fundamental desire of America. Our ideals and ambitions as a nation have been to promote peace. We must have a navy strong enough to sustain our peace ideals and powerful enough to be a restraining influence at all times on nations less given to the promotion of peace than ourselves.

This Nation needs and we must have a navy that is commensurate with our greatness if we are to maintain our position of influence among the nations of the world. Our influence can never be greater than our strength as a nation can command. Influence for good is in direct proportion to the strength we have to demand and support what we stand for.

High-sounding peace resolutions and declarations mean nothing unless there is back of them the strength that can uphold them when challenged.

The finest contribution this Nation can make to the cause of peace is to have a navy so strong that no other nation will dare or attempt to disturb our peace nor break the peace of the world.

The American Navy is a guaranty of peace. It has never been used except in self-defense or in the cause of human liberty, and there is no likelihood that it ever will.

Individuals who are opposed to a navy-building program may frequently be divided into two classes: First, those who have an ulterior motive to serve and at heart are enemies of our country, seeking to undermine and weaken it; and, second, those who are sincere and honest in their conviction that any naval building program entered into by this Nation will be interpreted by other nations as evidence that this Nation has entered upon an aggressive policy and that it will result in other nations entering into a competitive navy-building program.

Those who come within the first enumerated class are entitled to neither consideration nor respect, but merit denunciation as public enemies. For the individuals, however, who come within the second designated class I have respect, not because I believe their position is well founded, but because I have confidence in their sincerity of purpose. These individuals, many of whom I have the privilege and honor to know, belong to religious organizations that have left their imprint for good in the customs and laws of the communities in which they settled during the early days of this country, and in which they continue to be a dominating influence for good. Their citizenship has been of the character that gives strength and stability to our Nation.

Notwithstanding the high ideals and purposes that characterize the opposition of this class of individuals to any navy-building program undertaken by our Nation, yet, I am, nevertheless, just as firmly and conscientiously convinced that the cause of peace can best be promoted by our Nation providing itself with such instruments of defense as will most effectually deter any other nation less peacefully inclined from disturbing our own peace or that of any weaker nation which looks to us for protection.

Thus, while such individuals and myself are in accord in our desire to promote peace, yet we differ as to the means or the policy that will most effectually promote peace. If they are right in their theory that absence of all means of defense will induce an inclination and desire for peace that will be respected by other nations, then China should be the most respected and peaceful nation in the world. It has practically no army or navy. But instead of the blessings of peace it is continually in the midst of war. The conditions prevailing in China today give an accurate and true picture of the results that follow the failure of a nation to provide itself with adequate means of defense. This would, likewise, be the condition of our own country should we ever be so unwise as to fail to provide ourselves with adequate means of defense.

It is regrettable indeed that notwithstanding the numerous and sincere efforts that have been made by our Nation to bring about a general limitation of naval armament among the leading nations of the world, such has not been possible of consummation owing to the opposition and unwillingness of other nations which must and shall be a party to such agreements. It is impossible for our Nation, however, acting alone and unsupported, to bring about either world disarmament or limitation of armament. Such object can never be attained until each of the nations of the world shall feel an equal responsibility and a corresponding willingness to act in conjunction one with the other.

The total result of the efforts of our country to reduce armaments was the elimination by the United States of 800,000 tons of battleships belonging to us having a value of $400,000,000 and none by any other nation. Will Rogers has aptly said, "We never lost a war nor won a conference."

While international conferences have attempted in 1921, in 1927, and in 1930 to deal with the problem of naval disarmament, the League of Nations has been engaged for the last 10 years in an effort to deal with disarmament in general. Although numerous conferences have been held and different commissions provided for, as yet no agreement whatsoever has been entered into that in any way limits or reduces land armaments or even naval armaments except the conference of 1922, the net result of which was to reduce our own and no other navy.

What is the situation today? If we take stock of the situation as it stands today, at the end of 13 years of international effort, we find that notwithstanding the idealistic language of the Treaty of Versailles, which created the League of Nations and effectively limited the naval and military strength of Germany and established disarmament as a goal not only for the defeated powers but also for the victors, that the sum of $4,158,000,000 is now being spent for armaments by the nations of the world. This is nearly double the amount spent by the same nations the year before the war.

Today France has an organized military force of 6,298,428; Italy, 5,964,764; Russia, 5,167,000; Spain, 2,329,392; Poland, 1,974,033; Rumania, 1,890,612; Czechoslovakia, 1,647,121; Jugoslavia, 1,469,929. As against these tremendous armies, maintained at great expense even by these smaller nations of Europe, the United States of America, with the greatest material wealth in the world, has organized military forces, including National Guard men, Reserve officers, and so forth, of only 427,000.

And if we look at the size of the armies from the standpoint of population of the countries in which they exist, including men, women, and children, we find that in France 1 out of every 6 persons is a part of the organized military forces of that nation; Switzerland, 1 out of 6; Italy, 1 out of 7; Sweden, 1 out of 7; Czechoslovakia, 1 out of 9; Rumania, 1 out of 10; Yugoslavia, 1 out of 10; while in the United States only one third of 1 percent, or 1 out of 300 persons.

No one who thinks in terms of America, who recognizes the peaceful spirit of our people and understands that every effort upon the part of our Government to procure agreements from European countries effecting a reduction of armaments, has met practically with failure, can feel other than the justice of the position taken by patriotic citizens and organizations such as the American Legion, Gold Star Mothers, Daughters of the American Revolution, and so forth, when demand is made that we provide adequate means of national defense.

Furthermore, in close relationship to the matter of national defense is the question of cancelation of debts owing to us by foreign nations. Certain forces that are continually opposing any and every effort to provide for our defense and, using at this time the plea of economic necessity, are demanding the cancelation of foreign debts.

Again, they present the foreign viewpoint. They picture the backs of the people of European nations bending and breaking under the burden of taxation. They demand that this Nation as a great humanitarian, a big brother, shall cancel their indebtedness to us.

Taking advantage of present conditions, forces which have selfish interests to serve are contending that there can be no world-wide economic recovery unless our country cancels the debts owed to us by foreign nations.

There has been widespread propaganda sent throughout the country in order to create sentiment favorable to cancelation of foreign debts. It is contended that there can be no world economic recovery until cancelation has been effected and that recovery is impeded by our Nation refusing to do so.

It is well to remember that a few years ago we reduced the indebtedness of European nations to us by more than $6,000,000,000. This amount represented more than half of the total amount that was owing to us. Furthermore, it was equal practically to the entire amount advanced by us to them during the war. The balance of $5,800,000 which remained due was only that which had been advanced subsequent to the war to be used for rehabilitation purposes. Not only was our Government generous in canceling more than half of the indebtedness, but equally generous in permitting our foreign debtors to make payment of the balance due in installments extending over a period of 62 years.

The terms of settlement to which I have referred reduced the indebtedness of our principal debtors by the following amounts: Italy, 75.4 percent; France, 52.8 percent; Belgium, 53.5 percent; Great Britain, 19.7 percent.

Notwithstanding this substantial reduction that has already been made, it is now claimed that the amount to be paid each year in settlement of the balance constitutes a burden that foreign nations are unable to carry.

A study of the budgets of our foreign debtors does not justify this contention. The amount to be paid by Italy to us each year represents only 1.41 percent of its entire budget; Belgium, 2.45 percent; France, 2.65 percent; and Great Britain, 3.75 percent.

A further study of the budget of foreign nations reveals that their greatest expenditure is due to the maintenance of large and expensive armies and navies. This can be readily seen from the fact that France, as already stated, has a total organized military force of 6,942,559 men; Italy, 5,985,597; Poland, $1,977,095; Rumania, 1,725,660; Czechoslovakia, 1,647,121, and Yugoslavia, 1,341,568. The maintenance of such forces constitutes a burden upon foreign nations that makes any proposal to bring relief by canceling debts almost absurd.

These figures indicate that these nations are armed at this time more heavily than they have ever been, except during the World War. As long as this condition exists, the mere cancelation of the debts owing to us will not bring any relief to these nations. The amount due us is so infinitely small as compared to the expense of maintaining these forces, that it is ridiculous to contend that prosperity can be brought to such nations by cancelation of the debts owing to us.

There has been no indication of intention upon the part of foreign nations to dispense with any considerable portion of their armed forces. It can be assumed that any saving that would come as a result of cancelation of debts due us would only result in placing additional money at their disposal for armament purposes.

Furthermore, we must not overlook the fact that the loans advanced to foreign nations represent money borrowed by our Government from our own people and must be repaid to them. If we should cancel the debts, the burden of payment is thereby transferred from the foreign taxpayer and placed upon our own taxpayer. There is no justification for such a course. The remedy is for foreign nations to reduce their expensive armaments.

Furthermore, we must not overlook nor discount the fact that the present era is one of acute international political tension and economic competition. Unrest, turmoil, and severe economic hardship are prevalent throughout Europe, South America, and the Orient. We feel it here.

From such conditions wars are bred, and under such circumstances wars cannot in many cases be avoided in the absence of the strong stabilizing influence of armament. It is such power that frequently preserves peace.

It is natural that we should think of national defense in terms of protecting the homeland itself. But our country also has external interests of great importance to it. These must be protected, too, for the sake of the general welfare of our country and its people.

We have certain basic foreign policies of the highest consequence, such as the Monroe Doctrine, security of the Panama Canal, the open door in China, and so forth. Other nations also have their national policies. It is the conflict of these national policies that is a potential cause of war. National policies, then, are just exactly as strong as the Navy, and no stronger.

With the Navy also rests the security of our commercial interests on and across the sea. These are so vast that the economic life of our country depends on them. We seldom realize how intimately our business affairs are connected with the unseen hundreds of ships constantly plowing the sea lanes which lead from port to port along our immense coastline and across the seas to foreign markets. This protection must be exerted not only when we are ourselves engaged in war but also in the event of a war between other powerful nations in which we are neutral. Such a condition existed in 1812, when our maritime rights were violated without compunction by European nations engaged in a desperate struggle between themselves. The depredations of French cruisers against our commerce led to armed resistance, and war with France was barely avoided in 1810. Two years later the impressment of our seamen by English vessels forced us into a long and costly war with that country. Had we had at that time a Navy of respectable size it is highly probable that our rights would not have been so violated and that this war would have been avoided.

In 1914 we saw this situation repeated. A great war raged in Europe in which we had no part. Again our maritime rights were violated by all parties concerned, with consideration only to their own interests. Again we were finally drawn into a war in the origins of which we had no part. It is to be regretted that we did not at that time have sufficient naval force to say to all nations, "We are sending our merchant vessels on their lawful errands under the protection of our naval forces; molest them at your own risk!" Had we been able to do this, it would possibly have avoided our participation in this war. In any case a precedent would have been created which would have immensely strengthened respect for international law and neutral rights in future struggles.

As the Assistant Secretary of the Navy has recently pointed out, "Only the Navy can keep us from having our sea lanes blocked and can thus afford us the economic life insurance which is the main function of navies."

The question arises, What is an adequate navy for the United States? In deciding this question we must bear in mind the necessity of: (1) Cooperating with the Army in resisting invasion, (2) providing naval protection against coastal raids, (3) supporting our foreign national policies, and (4) protecting the vast sea-borne commerce so essential to national economic life.

The answer to the question of an adequate navy would be vague and unsatisfactory were it not for the known size and power of foreign navies which potentially are the forces with which our own Navy must contend if our national rights should be violated. Considering the superior scope and value of our interests on the sea, we had a policy that called for a navy second to none. This was before navies were limited by international agreement.

Since 1922, however, we have had treaties of naval limitation, and these now give us precise limits for our Navy which are acceptable to the other great naval powers. It ought to be apparent that what our naval rivals are willing to concede as a suitable American Navy should be the least size which will satisfy ourselves.

The answer to the question, then, of an adequate navy is the treaty navy.

In the unbalanced state of the world today no one can predict how or when the United States will urgently need a strong Navy to safeguard its immense interests, which are so intimately connected with its domestic security and economic welfare. Therefore, we need a treaty navy of ships, fully manned and adequately served by naval bases. With such a fleet we need not fear for our national security.

The question naturally arises, if a treaty navy is desirable or necessary, then, when should it be built? There are some, evidently not familiar with the shipbuilding industry, who claim that it is time enough when the emergency arises. Such a course would be a national folly and lead to destruction. Anyone who advocates such a course cannot be aware of the fact that it takes between 2 and 3 years to complete a ship of major proportions and requires the services of trained mechanics who cannot be created overnight.

The condition of our shipyards throughout the country is pitiable. Notwithstanding their importance in the time of war many of them have gone out of business. As an example of this fact, the Cramp Shipbuilding Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., has entirely closed after a continuous existence of nearly 100 years. The few which are left have only skeleton forces of draftsmen and mechanics.

As a further illustration of the deplorable condition existing in the shipbuilding industry, permit me to make reference to the New York Shipbuilding Co., of Camden, N.J., located within the district I have the honor to represent.

This shipyard has had the proud distinction of having constructed many of our finest warships—the Washington, Kansas, New Hampshire, Michigan, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Idaho, Colorado, and the new Washington, each in its time constituting warcraft of the most powerful type afloat, and the Saratoga, the most outstanding ship of its kind in all the world. Added to this type of fighting craft has also been that great number of auxiliary craft—cruisers, such as the Indianapolis, Salt Lake City, and others; destroyers; colliers; and so forth—that have been constructed in this shipyard and have by their record of achievement added to its fame and reputation, and won for those who labor there, from the highest to the lowest, well-merited honor and praise for work well done and craftsmanship unexcelled.

In addition to this worthy list of superdreadnaughts, cruisers, and destroyers there has also been a remarkable record of achievement in the construction of all other kinds of craft, including passenger liners, tankers, colliers, general cargo vessels, coastwise and river steamers, lightships, revenue cutters, fire boats, car floats—from the smallest to the mightiest vessel—each giving further unmistakable evidence of the high-class skill and workmanship of those who labor there.

To make possible this splendid record of ship construction has required years of effort to build up an efficient personnel—artisans trained in the hundred and more trades and types of employment that enter into the building of a ship. It has also required the expenditure of vast sums of money as capital for development purposes and plant construction. And yet this yard, and others equally important and so necessary in time of war as to be termed " our second line of defense ", and without which the last war could not have been successfully carried on, are being permitted to die and disappear in our midst.

The condition of the New York shipyard is but an example of many throughout the country. Holding on by sheer determination—hoping, everlastingly hoping for relief. In this vast yard of 191 acres, with ways capable of constructing 28 ships at one time, and facilities sufficient to employ 20,000 men, it is limping along with only a few ships under construction and employing approximately only 3,000 men.

The position is far more critical than many in high authority appreciate. The ships of the future will be larger and faster vessels than those of our war time built fleet and will require far more skill to design and build. It requires years to collect an organization of men trained to do this work, and during the last 8 years the shipbuilding industry has lost most of its trained men and is losing more every day. Our shipbuilding yards must have work, and have it soon, or this great element of national defense will fail us when we need it most.

The enactment of this legislation will do much to save the shipbuilding industry and preserve it as an important factor in our national defense. It will provide relief to thousands of our most highly trained and technical mechanics throughout the country who are now in great distress because of the collapse of the shipbuilding industry. And it will increase our national security by providing a more adequate defense. All of these worthwhile results can be accomplished without creating any antagonism, ill-feeling, or competitive building programs upon the part of other nations, because a navy of the type and number provided for in this and former bills is a " treaty navy " and within the limitations fixed by our agreement with other nations.

As the American Navy in the past has never been other than an instrument in the hands of our people to foster and maintain peace, so with confidence I have faith in its future usefulness because I continue to have faith in the peaceful purpose of America.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW], a member of the committee.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is a Member of this House, particularly those of us who served here during the long period of the World War, or those who participated in that war, who ever want to see another conflict like that come upon this earth. Feeling as I do, realizing all the horrors of the Great War, I think we, as Members of Congress and as Representatives of the American people, ought to do everything in our power to prevent future wars.

To me the bill before us is a step in this direction. I believe the best way for us to keep out of war is to be prepared. I well recall a statement made by a German statesman at the close of the Great War when he said:

> You blame Germany for the war because she was prepared. I blame America for the war because she was not prepared. Had she been prepared there would have been no war.

Feeling as I do about it and, as has often been stated here, that this is the best insurance we can have against war, I advocate the passage of this bill and the building up of our Navy to full treaty strength as the best way to keep from being again entangled in a war.

To me the necessity for building up our Navy to treaty strength was never more apparent than it is today. We see the troubled conditions in Europe and in the Far East, and certainly we do not want to become mixed up in those affairs. I believe this is the best way to keep out of them.

My good friend the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], who always speaks so earnestly and sincerely upon all questions, referred to the great expense of this program—$380,000,000, or possibly more, if costs continue to rise. But I wonder if the gentleman would not believe it a reasonable policy to pay such a premium on insurance that would keep us from being involved in another war, the cost of which would perhaps amount to $40,000,000,000.

There is one other aspect of this bill I wish to refer to. Today we are faced with the need of stringent Government economy. Simultaneously there is a demand that the Government take action to improve the distressful unemployment situation with which we are faced and give such push to industry and to commerce as will, it is hoped, start the car of prosperity rolling again. For this purpose there could be devised no method superior to a reasonable program of ship construction.

In this country we are, strangely enough, at present suffering from an excess of all things normally regarded as good. We have a surplus of farm products for which no consumers can be found. We have stocks of raw materials far beyond the present capacity of our manufacturing industry to utilize. We have well-equipped factories of every sort, capable of producing more than they sell. We have a transportation and distribution system more than ample to deal with our requirements.

And, finally, we have a mass of skilled and unskilled labor which cannot find employment. The situation cannot be met by raising more food or manufacturing more goods to add to our present surplus; not by building more factories or improving our present transportation and distribution system, which are already more than adequate.

What is required is a form of useful activity which will not further increase the ills from which we are suffering. If such an activity can be found, it will be reasonable that the present cost of putting these men to work shall to a moderate extent be made a charge against the future prosperity which such a policy is designed to produce.

The ore mines of Michigan, the forests of Oregon, the oil fields of Texas, the copper smelters of Utah, and the manufacturing interests of all the Eastern and Midwest States would alike feel the stimulating impetus of this program.

Then, too, we should be as much interested in retaining men in employment as in looking forward to finding positions for our vast army of unemployed. Our navy yards and shipyards demand the services of an efficient and especially trained personnel, and it is most important in the interest of our national defense that these highly trained workmen should have steady employment and be available and be the backbone of a still greater organization which would be required in case of a national emergency.

Admiral Land, Chief Constructor of the Navy, testified before the Committee on Naval Affairs that in all the shipyards of the country there is but one private ship being built, while several Navy ships are being constructed. This great industry is languishing.

Who of us is not willing to support efforts for world peace by international agreement? It is a fact that since the World War the United States has been in the forefront in advocating disarmament, and our efforts will no doubt continue in that direction. Other powers, however, have not and do not show an inclination to follow our example, and our present weakened position does not serve the cause of peace, but rather jeopardizes it.

I agree with the President that a treaty navy is the best insurance against war, and that it will be the most helpful thing we can do to bring about an international agreement for further limitation of armaments.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DARDEN].

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentleman, we are faced with the practical question whether or not we should build to the program we are entitled to.

This bill represents no departure from our intention as outlined at the Washington Naval Conference and subsequently reaffirmed at the London Naval Conference in 1930—that this Nation believes wholeheartedly in the limitation of armaments.

I might say in passing that I appreciate deeply the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Wisconsin, who spoke earlier on the bill.

I am concerned, and I believe I can say it on behalf of many other Members of the House who with me saw service at the front abroad, that I regret that we were not able in this House to stop the declaration of war. We went into it and spent such sums as your children will never be able to pay, and we accomplished absolutely nothing. [Applause.]

But to come back to this program showing you that this Nation is vitally interested in the peace of the world. When the nations met at Washington in 1922 we proposed to them to scrap our capital ships then built and building in the 1915 program. We proposed to scrap over 800,000 tons of the finest tonnage in the world. It is interesting to note that our present capital tonnage is less than one half a million, representing 15 battleships.

We did succeed in limiting capital ships to 525,000 tons and Great Britain to 525,000 tons and Japan to 315,000 tons. We did succeed at that conference in limiting the tonnage of battleships; but we were not able to do anything in relation to destroyers, cruisers, and submarines.

The result of the Washington Conference was such as to arrest the building of capital ships but transferred it into the lighter ships. While we stopped building battleships the other countries proceeded to build heavy cruisers. It can be said, and truthfully said, that we refused to enter into a race for cruiser supremacy.

We are not asking today to enter any race for supremacy; we are asking that we be allowed to construct the tonnage permitted us under the Washington and London Conferences. It will require a program of $380,000,000, a stupendous sum of money; but, remember, this is to last 5 years. The cruisers laid down in the fifth year will not be built for 3 additional years. The lighter ships under 3,000 tons, destroyers at 1,500 tons, will require 2 years to build. That embarks on a program of about $90,000,000 a year. That is equivalent to 70 cents per person for every man, woman, and child in this country.

Surely that is not an unreasonable assessment for national protection. I do not, nor does any man in this House, rise in defense of war. I hope we may never see another war. Certainly I hope we will never land another American soldier on foreign territory; but the fact remains that the rest of the world deems it necessary to maintain armament, and we cannot allow this Nation to slip into third or fourth place. We have today 251 destroyers, apparently a huge tonnage, but 248 of them are over-age and ineffective in actual combat. We have completed 10 of our major cruisers, and, when I say that, I mean the 8-inch type distinguished from the light 6-inch cruisers. We are building seven more, and on January 1, 1935, we will lay down the eighth, the last of the 18 allowed us in the cruiser category. We are asking in this bill that in the next 5 years we be permitted to build one airplane carrier, which will take the place of the obsolete Langley, which we have been experimenting with since shortly after the close of the war.

We are asking to build 65 destroyers to take the place of 248 destroyers that are today ineffective and over-age. We are asking that we be allowed to build submarine tonnage that will bring us up to our treaty limits. We have now submarine tonnage exceeding the treaty limits, but a large part of it is over-age and ineffective. We are faced with this practical question. We must either adhere to these treaties or lend our influence to have them revamped. If America, if Great Britain does not need 525,000 tons of capital tonnage, the answer is in not constructing, but the answer is in lowering the category in the treaty and not allowing any country to build them. There is no greater breeder of war than disparity of armament. It as surely leads to war as navy races and army races lead to war. When a country sees it is being overtaken and drawn away from, it resolves to submit its differences to the arbitrament of arms rather than wait until a later time when it will be more poorly equipped for conflict. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW].

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in much that has been said today about this bill as having for its object to build up the Navy to treaty limits, the impression I think perhaps has been given that the bill authorizes the addition to our existing Navy of more ships than we now have. As a matter of fact the various provisions of the bill give no such authorization. All that is provided in this bill is that the ships which are over-age, which have become obsolescent, which are antiquated, may be, if the President so desires and the money is available, replaced by new ships, better designed and better constructed than those which we now have. If you will examine the text of section 2 you will see that it provides, for example, for the construction of a certain tonnage of destroyers, but only to replace over-age destroyers. The same is true of the submarines. They are only to replace over-age submarines. The same is true of the new aircraft carrier. It is to replace the experimental aircraft carrier known as the "Langley" which has been in existence according to my recollection some dozen or more years. I think these facts should lodge in the mind of every Member in the House. This bill does not contemplate an enlargement of the Navy by so much as a single vessel. It does not attempt to direct when the substitution of new vessels for the old shall take place. It leaves that entirely to the judgment of the President, who will have to come back to Congress again to secure the necessary appropriation. The bill does not contemplate a bigger Navy in the matter of ships than that which we now have. But it expresses the desire of Congress that we bring our fleet up-to-date, get rid of those vessels that are obsolete, and build others to take their place. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in the debate this morning reference was made to the opposition to legislation of this character by certain pacific organizations in the United States. I have made somewhat of a study of the activities of these organizations and find that an appalling situation exists. I have noticed during my 20 years of service in this House that whenever appropriation bills are under consideration which have for their purpose an increase in the Navy or the Army these pacific organizations are busy. A part of these organizations are organized and well financed. I refer to those great endowments, the Carnegie Foundation, the Rockefeller Foundation, the Guggenheim Foundation—in fact, about 40 of them. They are all organized together under a voluntary head known as the "Twentieth Century Fund." The entire amount of funds, according to their sworn statement, amount to the enormous sum of $800,000,000. A great deal of this fund is being used in carrying on propaganda and lobbying against proper preparedness in behalf of the Army and the Navy. Their organization heads are busy, and in times like these have appeared in the offices of the Members of the House and Senate. They have their headquarters, some of them, in the Capitol here, and within the sound of my voice at this moment sits in the gallery the heads of one of these most subversive organizations, who is himself active at all times against proper preparedness in the United States.

Affiliated with these organizations that I have just referred to are many others of the active organizations, such as the Foreign Policy Organization, largely financed by the international financial group, that have for their purpose the weakening and holding down of proper preparedness in the United States.

I refer to a lot of other organizations that once or twice a year have meetings in our various cities, known as "political science" or other high-sounding names, as organizations. They are all in favor of the League of Nations and the World Court. They are all in favor of this international movement of consolidating the control of affairs of the United States in some foreign country. It is time we awakened, my friends, to what is going on in the United States.

On the 20th of April last I introduced a bill calling for an investigation of the activities of these various organizations. No attention has been paid to this resolution. The fact is that there is such financial power and influence back of those organizations that they bring pressure to bear against an investigation of that type of organization.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman insert in the RECORD the names of those organizations?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will insert them right now. I am very glad the gentleman wants to know. They are the Carnegie Foundation; the American Academy of Political and Social Science; the Foreign Policy Association; the American League to Limit Armaments; the American Neutral Conference Committee; the Emergency Peace Federation; the Fellowship of Reconciliation; the Woman's Peace Party; the Civil Liberties Bureau; the American Civil Liberties Union; the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom; the Committee on Militarism in Education; the National Council for Prevention of War; the War Resisters International; the Methodist Federation for Social Service; the League for Industrial Democracy; the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America; the Mooney-Billings Committee; the Peoples Lobby; the Peace Patriots; the League for Independent Political Action; the Socialist Party; and the League of Women Voters.

All of those organizations are actively engaged in breaking down proper preparedness in the United States.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Are they not all engaged in picking up dimes and nickels and quarters and halves from the credulous men and women all over the United States who think they are interesting themselves in the cause of peace when, in fact, they are keeping these professional pacifists alive?

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is quite correct as to a certain number of them. I am referring to those which are not supported by these foundation funds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania 2 additional minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, on February 3 last I took occasion to call the attention of this House to this situation, and I want to quote a paragraph from what I then stated. I am quoting from that speech:

> Let me quote from the book Triumphant Democracy, written by Andrew Carnegie and published by Charles Scribner's Sons in 1893. The concluding words of this book, which appear on pages 548 and 549, are as follows:
> "Readers will kindly note this as a look ahead—how far ahead I shall not attempt to guess; nevertheless, it is ahead, and sometime, somehow, it is to come to pass. I see it with the eye of faith—the faith of the devotee which carries with it a realizing sense of certain fulfillment.
> "Time may dispel many pleasing illusions and destroy many noble dreams, but it shall never shake my belief that the wound caused by the wholly unlooked-for and undesired separation of the mother from her child is not to bleed forever.
> "Let men say what they will; therefore, I say that as surely as the sun in the heavens once shone upon Britain and America united, so surely is it one morning to rise, shine upon, and greet again the reunited state—the British-American union."
> Andrew Carnegie's body is dead, but his money marches on.
> "The wholly unlooked-for and undesired separation of the mother from her child"! Undesired by whom? Surely not by that Washington whose anniversary we celebrate this year. Surely not by the inspired farmers and traders and hunters who beat back the British battalions on the slopes of Bunker Hill, brought Burgoyne to surrender at Saratoga, starved at Valley Forge, and rose to final triumph at Yorktown. Surely not the generations of simple and hardy women and men who shaped this Nation from the wilderness with no other tools than ax, rifle, and hope.
> "The reunited state—the British-American union"!

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK].

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much impressed with the illuminating remarks of the chairman of this committee on the Democratic side, and also the remarks made by the ranking Member on the Republican side. Coming from Pennsylvania, I feel I should be interested in this great shipbuilding program because of the work that will come to the State of Pennsylvania, the iron ore that will be used, and so on.

Of the 11 ships in the convoy on which I sailed to France in 1918, not a single vessel belonged to the United States of America. I realized then the weakness of our Navy, and ever since that time I have felt it would be better if we were a little more prepared for war. The vessel on which I sailed was the interned Kaiser Wilhelm. It was then renamed the President Lincoln. On that vessel were some 6,000 men, 5,600 soldiers and 500 or more in the crew. On the return trip that vessel was torpedoed and sunk. Over half of the crew went down and the brave captain of that ship was lost. The conditions on that ship on the way over were simply terrible. They were just as good as they could be, but if that ship had been torpedoed with those 6,000 men on her, I believe firmly that over half of them would have been lost.

There are arguments on both sides of this question. It seems like a tremendous amount of money to be spending; yet, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW] pointed out, it is the same as an insurance policy, and if the expenditure of some eighty or ninety million dollars per annum will in any way insure our country against war, I feel it is money well spent.

The Washington Conference of 1922 was a failure as far as the United States was concerned. It cost us 800,000 tons of shipping, and I am not prepared to say how many millions of dollars that represented. The 1930 Conference again was a dismal failure, and we have no reason to believe that the coming conference will be any different from the ones which have preceded it.

From our experience in the late war with our shipping at that time, I feel it is only the sane and sensible thing to go on with this construction program as it has been outlined.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK] has expired.

Mr. SWICK. Section 4 of this bill provides that in the event of international agreement for further limitations of naval armaments to which the United States is signatory, the President is hereby authorized and empowered to suspend so much of its naval construction authorized by this act as may be necessary to bring the naval armament of the United States within the limitation so agreed upon.

America is, and always has been, a peace-loving nation, and it is with the hope that at this coming peace conference there may be a marked limitation of naval armament that I support this measure.

Saint Paul, following in the footsteps of the Prince of Peace, wrote:

We should have our feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of Peace.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DOCKWEILER].

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, the human mind is prone to forget. The recent war has been over but little more than a decade. We are now being privileged, through the agency of the Hearst newspapers throughout this country, to view the uncensored pictures of some of the terrible incidents of the World War. I believe every adult in this country should look at these pictures and regard them carefully, because they represent an epitome of human suffering.

Andrew Jackson said that the summation of evil was war. Now, Mr. Chairman, there are a great many people in this country who were too young to remember the cruel incidents of the World War; they have grown up since then and have reached the age of majority. I suggest to them that they look at these pictures and keep them as a constant reminder of the cruelties of war. I suggest to the Members of this Congress that it would be well for each of them to keep one of these pictures on his desk, so that in the future we shall regard very carefully any declaration of war.

I am for a treaty-strength Navy. Mr. Chairman, I am for this bill. I believe that had we had such a navy a year and a half ago the Japanese would not have dared to encroach upon Manchuria, nor would they have dared to go into the city port of Shanghai and do what they did.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCFARLANE].

SHALL WE AUTHORIZE THE PRESIDENT TO BUILD, IF NECESSARY, THE NAVY TO TREATY STRENGTH?

Mr. MCFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, we who have listened today to the arguments pro and con regarding the measure before us fully realize the importance of the bill upon which we are soon to vote.

In the beginning I wish to call to your attention again the fact that this is an administration measure. Colonel Roosevelt, who came before our committee, clearly brought out the necessity for this program. I am afraid many of those who have spoken are unduly alarmed about the effect of this measure, because after all it is only an authorization bill; it does not appropriate one penny of the taxpayers' money. It says to the President that he shall have the power to bring our Navy up to treaty strength. Do you have confidence in the President? Do you believe he will abuse that power?

We new Members of the House during the special session which began last March heard our leaders time and again take the floor of this House and appeal for the support of a united front on both sides of the aisle to give the program of the President a chance.

LET US CARRY ON THE PROGRAM

The pending measure authorizes the President to do for the Navy in case of necessity what we have largely authorized him to do for banking, Budget balancing, farming, direct unemployment relief, securities regulation, farm-mortgage relief, Muscle Shoals power, home-mortgage relief, inflation, railroad reorganization, national industrial recovery, and gold devaluation.

We are seeking through this bill to do today what we should have done years ago. We have waited too long to start this building program. For 11 years, you might say, we have been derelict in our duty to construct year after year that portion of the Navy we should have constructed to keep up with the progress made by the other great naval powers of the world. So we now find ourselves at this time ranking third among the great naval powers. Admiral Standley told our committee that our Navy has not been fully manned since the World War. As the committee hearings on the bill show, the personnel of our Navy today is but 78 percent what it should be.

COMPARATIVE COST OF MAINTENANCE

Much has been said about the great expense of the Navy and what it is costing this country to maintain it. We will not suffer by comparison when the comparison of the amount of our national income spent for maintenance is compared to the wealth of our Nation, when the same comparison of expenditures is made with that of the other great naval powers. To the speakers here this afternoon who have made extravagant statements regarding naval cost and maintenance I would call attention to the fact that the United States in normal times spends 0.43 percent of its national income to maintain its Navy; Great Britain spends 1.48 percent of its national income to maintain its navy; France, 1.67 percent; Italy, 1.75 percent; Japan, 2.39 percent. We stand at the bottom of the list.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the table showing a comparison of the five great naval powers, income, naval budgets, ratio of naval budget to national income, income per capita, and cost of navy per capita.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Country	National income, 1930	Naval budgets, 1930–31	Ratio of naval budget to national income	Income per capita, 1930	Cost of Navy per capita, 1930
United States	$89,419,000,000	$382,424,000	$0.0043	$760	$3.24
British Empire	18,390,000,000	[1] 273,000,000	[1].0148	420	[1] 6.21
France	8,500,000,000	[1] 142,396,000	[1].0167	203	[1] 3.39
Italy	4,500,000,000	[1] 78,798,000	[1].0175	105	[1] 1.84
Japan	5,500,000,000	131,469,000	.0239	87	2.08

WE CAN TRUST THE PRESIDENT

Mr. MCFARLANE. I take it to be generally understood that in all probability the program authorized in this bill will not be carried out unless it is absolutely necessary. We have all been told of the coming naval conference to be held next year. There is not a man within the sound of my voice who does not have complete confidence in that great leader in the White House; but, if it does become necessary that we build up to treaty strength, should not someone in our country have such power and authority? Should not the President of the United States have the right to go ahead and say "Build"?

DISARMAMENT HAS FAILED—LET US PREPARE

We tried in the Washington Conference in 1922, and again in the London Conference in 1930 to get the other nations to join us in a disarmament program. You know the results of those conferences.

We have tried everything else. You have seen the figures indicating how much of our Navy has been scrapped in the past 12 years in the effort to maintain peace; but did this effort produce results among the other great powers of the world insofar as the race to build large navies is concerned? Millions upon millions of dollars' worth of our best ships have been scrapped; and while we have been scrapping ships, the other naval powers have been scrapping blueprints only. Not a nation of the world has tried so hard as ours to maintain world peace. We have kept faith with everyone, but the other nations cannot say the same of themselves.

We have now come to the point where we are face to face with the proposition of deciding whether or not we are willing to grant this power to the Commander in Chief to build if it is necessary. Are you by your vote going to say he should not be given this power?

THE WORLD WANTS PEACE

I take it a vote of the Membership of the House would disclose 99 percent of them in favor of peace. We are all in favor of peace. The question is how best to maintain peace. History records that those countries least prepared for war are the ones which have been most abused. I submit in all fairness and candor that the cheapest insurance for peace Congress can give this country is the enacting of this measure giving the President of the United States the power granted him in it. Such action will be a guaranty of permanent peace. This bill is one of the most important pieces of legislation Congress could enact to carry into effect this program. [Applause.]

Mr. DELANEY. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] such time as he may require.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am particularly interested in the proviso beginning on line 16 and ending with line 21, on page 2, reading:

Provided, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to replace, by vessels of modern design and construction, vessels in the Navy in the categories limited by the treaties signed at Washington, February 6, 1922, and at London, April 22, 1930, when their replacement is permitted by the said treaties.

As to that particular proviso, Mr. Chairman, and the bill generally, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, why is this measure brought in here?

If it is not a gesture, and I have no reason to believe that it is; it will do more, in my judgment, to promote suspicion, ill will, and discord than anything we possibly could do, and undo much of the efforts of sincere and honest statesmen, not the representatives of selfish interests, extending over a number of years to promote world peace and curtail armaments.

I do not know who conceived this measure, but I do not know of anything we could possibly do that would better please the selfish commercial interests who live by the profits derived from matériel supplied to the Military and Naval Establishments.

What a splendid atmosphere we are building for our emissaries to the next conference on the limitation of naval armaments which meets a year hence!

In the naval bill passed by the House a few days ago every bit of ship construction that may be proceeded with at this time was provided for in the categories in which we are short. Bear that in mind.

As to the so-called "replacement construction", we have an experimental carrier which may be replaced at any time under the terms of the London Treaty, and it is true that practically all our destroyer tonnage, not building, is technically over age and may be replaced at any time. Also we have 7,700 tons of submarine tonnage, not yet technically over age, but the replacement tonnage for which may be commenced now. But let me tell you about this so-called "over-age tonnage."

At the London Conference some men sat at a table and arbitrarily determined that if a destroyer was laid down before the 1st of January 1921, it would be over age 12 years thereafter, but if it was laid down 1 day, mark you, subsequently, its life would be 4 years more; in other words, 16 years. The life of a submarine was fixed at 13 years unconditionally. It so happens that practically all of our destroyers were laid down prior to January 1, 1921.

Now, on January 20, 1931, let me tell you what the Chief Constructor of the Navy told the Appropriations Committee. In referring to 86 destroyers that had just been thoroughly overhauled and recommissioned, in response to an inquiry as to whether or not they had had much service, Admiral Rock said:

They have not; no, sir. They have been kept in fairly good condition. They have had very little service, and therefore the hulls in general are in very good condition.

Mr. FRENCH. That would also be true of the machinery?

Admiral ROCK. It probably would be true of machinery also.

Mr. TABER. What would you estimate the life of those destroyers—those 86?

Admiral ROCK. After recommissioning?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Admiral ROCK. Certainly 10 years for the hulls.

Mr. TABER. And they might do better?

Admiral ROCK. Yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Mr. FRENCH. Are these well built?

Admiral ROCK. You mean the old ones?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes, sir.

Admiral ROCK. Very well built, and the reports as to the condition of their hull are excellent. Some places have shown rapid deterioration, I think perhaps due to hurry in building them, not taking as much care as should have been taken, to make every part entirely accessible. But outside of those few places, they are in excellent condition.

Mr. FRENCH. Would they correspond to destroyers that you would build today in that regard, approximately?

Admiral ROCK. I think the destroyers we build today would be better, Mr. French, because we would be more thorough in applying such protective measures as galvanizing the plating in the locations where otherwise it could deteriorate. Our destroyers are built specially rugged in order that they may have such sea-going qualities as are required; for a small boat like a destroyer to drive into a heavy sea and to withstand damage means that they have to be heavily framed and heavily built, and we have followed that in the past, and we are following that in our new design.

I gave that as bearing directly on your question as to whether they deteriorated rapidly and whether we would look on destroyers as a class of ships that would deteriorate and go down and out in a short number of years. As to hull, that does not apply. They have a long life.

Now, in the face of that testimony by one of the ablest naval constructors we have ever had, here just 3 years later we are asked to pass a bill to construct replacements for those destroyers at a cost of $250,381,600.

But that is not half the story, my friends. The report on this bill indicates that, in addition to these destroyers, other construction for which the bill provides will bring the total expenditure to $380,329,250. Now, do not be fooled by that. This bill has been very adroitly phrased. There is a very interesting proviso, commencing in line 16, page 2, under which the President, subject to an appropriation therefor, would be empowered to replace after the calendar year 1936, if the existing treaties be not continued, 15 battleships of 525,000 tons gross. You will note that the first section of the bill permanently establishes the composition of the United States Navy in accordance with the limits prescribed in existing treaties for combatant vessels of the several categories.

Think of it, gentlemen! We are here asked to approve of the construction of 15 capital ships of 35,000 tons, average that may be laid down after January 1, 1936. Fifteen great big lumbering hulks that cost in the neighborhood of $40,000,000 apiece to build, which, in the event of a war, with a big naval power, would, as Admiral Sims, I believe, it was who said, "Better be tied up somewhere up the Mississippi out of harm's way."

So, we are not providing for the expenditure of $380,000,000. We are, in truth, asked to authorize an expenditure over a period of years of a sum more nearly in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000. Possibly this is an understatement.

Now, addressing myself more particularly to my Democratic colleagues: What about our party platform? In that very recent covenant with the people we declared for so ordering our defense establishments "that the people in time of peace may not be burdened by an expenditure fast approaching $1,000,000,000 annually." It looks to me like the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], in his enthusiasm, has forsaken this pledge, and it is a pledge, completely. He not only appears to be trying to out-Britain Britain, but to out-Britten, his senior Republican committee member, FRED BRITTEN, and that is going pretty strong.

We passed a bill here a few days ago for the Navy, which, in conjunction with expenditures from N.R.A. funds, will create a cash Treasury demand during the fiscal year 1935 of $478,000,000. This bill proposes to add to the figure—that is, just for next year alone—$23,180,000. Then, according to the papers, this same committee which has brought in this bill is about to bring in another increasing the Navy's airplane strength from 1,000 to 2,184, and which looks to a further expenditure on that account during 1935 of not less than $4,500,000. In other words, the plans thus far look to a naval expenditure next year in excess of $500,000,000.

That is not all, gentlemen. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] stated here in the course of his speech on the naval appropriation bill the other day that a treaty Navy, as now delimited, is going to cost us annually to maintain not less than $459,000,000. Someone here the other day, on the same day, I believe, stated that a treaty Navy would require something like 115,000 men. Gentlemen, a treaty Navy with 115,000 men, according to Navy experts, would cost annually pretty close to $525,000,000.

So, my friends, we may just as well face the facts. Despite our party pledge, we are asked here today to join in this spending orgy. To use an expression in one of the popular weekly radio broadcasts: "It is only the beginning, gentlemen; only the beginning."

In view of our large interest-bearing debt that is piling up, I just do not see how we are going to pay the annual interest charges, to say nothing of retiring any part of the debt, support defense establishments of any such proportions as here advocated, and have anything left for other Federal activities, without so burdening the people with taxation as to cause a general revolt.

We have got to look to the future, in my judgment. It is all very nice to sit here and applaud speeches of this fellow or that fellow who waves the flag and would lead you to believe that he is more patriotic than some other fellow who believes in reckoning the cost; but however distasteful it may be to be reminded of, your constituents and my constituents sooner or later have got to pay for any extravagances in which we may here indulge.

We are not out of the depression yet by a long shot. Not a man within the sound of my voice knows how long and to what extent the Federal Government may be required to continue to give Federal aid to relieve distress. I personally feel that the end would be nearer if the money some seem to be so anxious to spend upon the Army and Navy were spent directly in our districts in building modern schoolhouses, providing small libraries in rural communities, and in similar directions where local unemployment would be immediately and directly benefited and from which local communities would derive lasting good.

The farmer is in distress—the cotton grower, the wheat grower, the stock raiser. Four million men have been given temporary work out of Federal funds in lieu of a dole. Three hundred thousand unemployed young men are scattered among camps maintained by the Government all over the land, and thousands upon thousands are working on Public Works projects costing a sum which cannot possibly be continued. Until we can see such demands as these disappearing, and, if they do not disappear, a way evolved to continue Federal support, by no vote of mine nor, I shall hope, by no vote of any man representing a district where poverty and want and hunger prevail shall our Government engage in throwing away vast sums needlessly upon alleged military weapons whose merit is negligible and whose need does not exist. This terrible emergency should not be used as an excuse for this wasteful expenditure.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2½ minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I wish to thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] and also the gentleman on this side [Mr. VINSON] for the time they allowed me to speak on this bill. I cannot say very much in 2½ minutes, nevertheless I appreciate the time extended me.

Mr. Chairman, I maintain the United States of America should be second to no nation in the world when it comes to an army, navy, marines, and other fighting units, provided it is absolutely essential to have a big army, navy, and so forth. We should hesitate to expend the taxpayers' money for naval construction unless it is absolutely essential.

It seems to me that if the United States Government would take the initiative of calling together all the nations in the world for the purpose of total disarmament, we would get somewhere. It is true that efforts have been made in the past in that direction, but I do not hesitate to say that these efforts were not sincere, and I would go on record as supporting everything the United States would do in constructing the greatest navy in the world if these other nations that were asked to disarm refused to do so.

Mr. Chairman, there are many thousands of school teachers in the United States who have not received one cent of compensation for over a year for the valuable services which they have rendered in behalf of their Nation. It seems to me that we ought to do something in behalf of those men and women, on whom civilization depends.

Mr. DUNN. It is my opinion education is one of the most effective weapons which can be used to eradicate all those things which prevent progress. Ignorance is the biggest obstacle in the path of progress. If more money would be spent for educational purposes instead of for guns to destroy human life, the people of the world would become elevated to the point that they would look upon their fellow men, regardless of their creed, nationality, race, or color, as their brother; therefore let us appropriate money to pay the unpaid school teachers, and also appropriate money to take care of all of our ex-service men, their widows, and dependents, who sacrificed practically all they had in the last two wars—the Spanish-American and World War—and also let us appropriate money to eradicate the slum districts and poorhouses and make it possible that every man and woman who is able to work will have a job at a living wage, and those who are too old to work and physically incapacitated be provided with an adequate pension. If we do these things, we will be rendering a really valuable service to all mankind.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, consistency is quite a jewel. Back in the year 1922 we entered into an agreement with some of the European powers and then decided to scrap part of our Navy. I will refer to one boat, the battleship Washington. After we had invested $40,000,000 in actual labor and material in this battleship, we towed it out to sea and sank it, along with $650,000,000 worth of other material in ships that had either been built or were in the process of being built.

We have lots of money to play with, and I say, O Patriotism, what crimes have been committed in thy name? I say that so far as the Hearst pictures of the World War are concerned, this is being done as propaganda in order to stir up and enthuse Members of Congress in favor of the various societies of war mongers, the Steel Trust, and you can spell that either way you want to, and others who are going to make the big money out of this Navy program. You can throw mud and impugn the good intentions of our religious organizations, who believe in the philosophy of the Prince of Peace and the philosophy of peace on earth and good will toward men. I lived upon the southwestern plains at a time when every man carried a gun in his pocket and when it was dangerous business to reach into your hip pocket to get your handkerchief unless you were quick on the draw. I want to tell you that crimes were committed by those who carried the guns.

We heard the great argument that the Kaiser of Germany put up for years and years in order to build up that military system of his. Oh, how he was going to prepare and keep out of war; all under the guise of holy peace. I want to say for those who went through the last war that there are a few here who stood on the floor and voted against that war. It was the President's policy back in 1917 when he came here and asked the Congress to vote for war after he was elected on a program of peace. The people voted for peace and got war.

We had no business in that war. We have no business over in China right now. We have no business in Cuba other than to protect the investment of Woodin and the Chase National Bank and some more people of that kind.

We talk about preparedness. Today there are 5,000,000 little boys and girls in the United States of America who are going to bed hungry, who cannot go to school because they have no shoes to wear or food to eat, because their people are poor. Their parents have no work. And here we throw this money into the sea when science has revealed that they now have a gas so deadly poisonous that they can drop one bomb and kill every bit of animal and vegetable life in an area covering 6 square miles. Where would the Navy be? With a few of these bombs you could destroy the whole works in less than 24 hours.

Let us help people live instead of trying to build up machinery of destruction. Let us not build up the instruments of destruction in order to destroy every bit of civilization.

I wonder if the Members of this Congress realize what this means? We can impugn the motives of the church organizations, but the hand of the Steel Trust is back of this, and my State would benefit by this program, because the State of Minnesota produces 80 percent of the iron ore of the world. But I would rather feed this money into the C.W.A., the P.W.A., and give it to the school teachers who have sacrificed their salaries, and build up the children, take them out of the rut they are in, the crippled, puny little people, and make good patriotic citizens out of them. I believe that is the best move this Congress could make toward preparedness, because we cannot fight a war with those little children who are going to bed hungry and who will grow up as dwarfs and weaklings. If we are to have preparedness, let us have it here in America. I believe in defending America. If war were declared, I would furnish my own guns and ammunition to defend America, but I will never go to a foreign land to fight for J. Pierpont Morgan, Barney Baruch, and Hugh S. Johnson, or any other puppets of the gods of greed. I shall vote against this bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, there is one statement that the former President of the United States made with which I can agree most heartily. He made this statement:

International trade is the lifeblood of civilization.

And this is true. International trade has raised the human race from the state of savagery to the heights it occupies today.

In order that we may exist as a nation it is necessary that we expand along the lines of international trade. We have an enormous population, which, if possible, must be furnished with employment. The great and only possible market of the future is in the East, and let me call your attention to the fact that history proves that whenever trade lanes converge there is danger of international conflict. Commercial interests will clash in the markets of the world as long as human nature is human nature and commerce continues. It is necessary that we have a Navy second to none to protect our foreign trade, and if we expand our foreign trade in the East, as we must, we must look for protection by a navy in that quarter of the globe.

I wonder if any Member of this House who has ever crossed a submarine-haunted sea on a transport unprotected by a convoy would be willing to place his son in that position, unprotected by any naval vessel. This is something for everyone to think of, and I think for the future of this Nation, for the protection of our own sons, if it is ever necessary that they should cross the seas, we owe it to them to give them all the protection possible. We can do this by no other means than a sufficient and an efficient navy. [Applause.]

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, it is my intention at the proper time to offer the following amendment to this bill. On page 3, line 9, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof "except that such suspension shall not apply to vessels actually under construction."

I want to make it plain that in proposing this amendment in no sense do I entertain the feeling of a lack of confidence in the present Executive of this Nation. I am proceeding upon that old theory that life is always uncertain, and we have no assurance as to who will be the Chief Executive of this Nation at the next naval disarmament conference. I hope that it will be our present President, Mr. Roosevelt.

Mr. Chairman, I am thinking now of what occurred in the Washington Naval Armament Conference of 1922. If any statesman or anyone in authority in this Nation had announced to the people of the United States as early as 1918 that there would be a conference of the great naval powers of the world within 4 years from that date, at which conference this country would agree to destroy the best Navy of any nation in the world, it would have been considered too preposterous for serious consideration. But it is fresh in the memory of all that this very thing occurred, and it is to provide against a repetition of this deplorable mistake that I offer this amendment.

The great Navy provided for in the 1916 program, advocated and made possible by legislation passed by Congress, provided for the construction of 157 naval vessels of various types which when completed would have placed the United States in the position of being the foremost naval power. Then what happened? It is a sad story to relate.

First, it is a well-known fact that this 1916 naval-construction program was halted by reason of this Nation entering the World War. However, shortly after peace was declared the Navy Department, under the direction of President Wilson and Secretary of Navy Daniels, started to complete this program, and may I say all of the vessels provided for in that program were built or building at the close of the Wilson administration. And may I further state that if this program had been completed, we would have had a Navy equal to the best and at a lower cost.

But this is what happened. While this 1916 program was well under construction the Naval Armament Treaty, made at Washington in 1922, stopped its progress, and not only stopped it but provided for the destruction of much of it. To be more specific, at that conference Secretary of State Hughes, who headed the American delegation, made to the conference the magnanimous proposal which was accepted and made a part of the naval disarmament agreement or treaty, as follows:

The United States is now completing its program of 1916 calling for 10 battleships and 6 battle cruisers. One battleship has been completed. The others are in various stages of construction; in some cases from 60 to 80 percent of the construction has been done.

On these 15 capital ships now being built over $330,000,000 have been spent. Still the United States is willing, in the interest of an immediate limitation of naval armament, to scrap all of these ships.

The United States proposes, if this plan is accepted, to scrap all capital ships now under construction. This includes 6 battle cruisers and 7 battleships on the ways and in course of building and 2 battleships launched. The total of new capital ships when completed would be 618,000 tons.

It is needless to say that this generous proposal was eagerly accepted on the part of the delegates of the other nations at this conference.

That, my friends, answers the question of what happened to the 1916 naval program, which, when completed, would have provided the United States, as already stated, the greatest, the most powerful navy of any nation. However, because of our generosity, our magnanimous spirit, as displayed by Secretary Hughes on that occasion, we agreed to, and did, destroy all of this new construction, amounting to $330,000,000, for a promise on the part of the naval powers like Great Britain, Japan, and others. That is not all we destroyed. That is to say, we destroyed and scrapped additional ships of about 222,000 tons, or, all told, 840,000 tons; and the American citizen wonders why it is that at this time we have a second-, if not a third-class navy, and that notwithstanding the many, many hundreds of millions of dollars that have been spent to keep it a first-class navy. I regret to say that too many of these millions of dollars have been wasted, just as shown in the Naval Armament Conference at Washington, where we threw away over $330,000,000.

I call your attention to the fact that the other nations at that conference, like Great Britain, Japan, and France, scrapped some of their old ships, many of which were obsolete and others obsolescent. There was but little, if any, of their new construction scrapped.

We have experienced the difference between disarmament by promises, implied or otherwise, on the part of other nations, and disarmament by example on the part of this Nation.

Therefore, because of this experience, I am exceedingly anxious to guard against a repetition in the next naval disarmament conference of what occurred in the Washington conference of 1922.

In other words, if an agreement is entered into to scrap ships, I want this Nation to begin at the bottom, as did other nations at the Washington Conference, and not scrap that which is actually under construction, as we agreed to do, and did so, at the Washington Conference.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, active duties in connection with the Appropriations Committee have made it impossible for me to be present during the discussion of this bill, and the only speech which I have heard in opposition to the bill was the one made a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER]. I do not think the gentleman correctly interprets the feeling of the Members of this House when he says that we challenge the motives of those who, because of lack of information, I think, are opposed to this legislation.

This legislation is the culmination of some historic facts of recent date, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCFARLANE] gave the key to such historic facts when he said that this Nation is on record, in a most positive way, in declaring its desire for peace. This was voiced by your President last summer when he sent to the nations of the earth a message to this effect; and I shall ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to insert that message as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. There was no favorable response to this message which sought to secure a promise of assurance from the nations of the earth that they were willing to meet and further discuss a reduction in the expenses incident to the maintenance of sea and land armaments. Receiving no favorable response, it was then that the President, without, so far as I know, any protest being registered by any organization or any informed American, released $238,000,000 for the improvement of navy yards and the construction of certain types of ships, which, when completed, will still leave us far short of the treaty navy.

This House only last week, by unanimous vote, with no amendment offered thereto, passed the Navy appropriation bill, thereby fully endorsing the action previously taken by the President. Why do I say so? Because the committee's report and many items carried in the bill called special attention to the action of the President taken last summer following his memorable and unanswered message. This bill now before the House is about two short pages in length, drawn in simple, plain, unambiguous language, so that no one reading it can misunderstand its full purpose and intent, and the committee reporting it should be commended therefor. Why? Because the committee briefly, yet with great clarity, has called attention to two important treaties entered into between our country and other nations of the world, to which public approval has been registered in no uncertain way, and which this bill authorizes the President to carry out when, in his judgment, it is wise to do so.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] has just read the last section of the bill, where it is provided that if those nations that refused last summer to respond to that splendid appeal of the President to limit and cut down armament expense should now change their minds, the President is authorized to curtail, limit, and stop the building of ships now or hereafter authorized. Could there be a stronger expression of our country's desire for peace than is found in this section 4 of the bill? What American, believing in his country, believing in the necessity of providing reasonable security for his country's safety, can with sound reasons question the wisdom of this Congress conferring on the President authority to build a Navy within treaty limits and which other nations have not only given willing assent to but have invited by exercising their rights under such treaties to rapidly proceed with their building programs and to refuse to call a halt in response to our President's appeal?

That is all this bill provides for. The gentleman from Minnesota would, if the thoughts he expressed were carried to a logical conclusion, dismiss all sheriffs, all police, and other protection to life and property, both national and individual. When he reads more carefully this bill and studies its sane, wholesome, and patriotic purpose, I venture to indulge the hope that he may find, on further reflection, no justification for the alarm he expresses nor any foundation for what he imagines to be the thought and feeling of this House as to the motives of those who, without information, may have expressed disapproval of this bill. [Applause.]

Under leave granted by the House, the following message of the President, sent on May 16 to practically all the nations of the world, is set out as a part of my remarks:

A profound hope of the people of my country impels me, as the head of their Government, to address you and, through you, the people of your nation. This hope is that peace may be assured through practical measures of disarmament and that all of us may carry to victory our common struggle against economic chaos.

To these ends the nations have called two great world conferences. The happiness, the prosperity, and the very lives of the men, women, and children who inhabit the whole world are bound up in the decisions which their governments will make in the near future. The improvement of social conditions, the preservation of individual human rights, and the furtherance of social justice are dependent upon these decisions.

The World Economic Conference will meet soon and must come to its conclusions quickly. The world cannot await deliberations long drawn out. The conference must establish order in place of the present chaos by a stabilization of currencies, by freeing the flow of world trade, and by international action to raise price levels. It must, in short, supplement individual domestic programs for economic recovery, by wise and considered international action.

The Disarmament Conference has labored for more than a year and, as yet, has been unable to reach satisfactory conclusions. Confused purposes still clash dangerously. Our duty lies in the direction of bringing practical results through concerted action based upon the greatest good to the greatest number. Before the imperative call of this great duty, petty obstacles must be swept away and petty aims forgotten. A selfish victory is always destined to be an ultimate defeat. The furtherance of durable peace for our generation in every part of the world is the only goal worthy of our best efforts.

If we ask what are the reasons for armaments, which, in spite of the lessons and tragedies of the World War, are today a greater burden on the peoples of the earth than ever before, it becomes clear that they are twofold: First, the desire, disclosed or hidden, on the part of governments to enlarge their territories at the expense of a sister nation. I believe that only a small minority of governments or of peoples harbor such a purpose. Second, the fear of nations that they will be invaded. I believe that the overwhelming majority of peoples feel obliged to retain excessive armaments because they fear some act of aggression against them and not because they themselves seek to be aggressors.

There is justification for this fear. Modern weapons of offense are vastly stronger than modern weapons of defense. Frontier forts, trenches, wire entanglements, coast defenses—in a word, fixed fortifications—are no longer impregnable to the attack of war planes, heavy mobile artillery, land battleships called "tanks", and poison gas.

If all nations will agree wholly to eliminate from possession and use the weapons which make possible a successful attack, defenses automatically will become impregnable and the frontiers and independence of every nation will become secure.

The ultimate objective of the Disarmament Conference must be the complete elimination of all offensive weapons. The immediate objective is a substantial reduction of some of these weapons and the elimination of many others.

This Government believes that the program for immediate reduction of aggressive weapons, now under discussion at Geneva, is but a first step toward our ultimate goal. We do not believe that the proposed immediate steps go far enough. Nevertheless, this Government welcomes the measures now proposed and will exert its influence toward the attainment of further successive steps of disarmament.

Stated in the clearest way, there are three steps to be agreed upon in the present discussions:

First. To take, at once, the first definite step toward this objective, as broadly outlined in the MacDonald plan.

Second. To agree upon time and procedure for taking the following steps.

Third. To agree that while the first and the following steps are being taken no nation shall increase its existing armaments over and above the limitations of treaty obligations.

But the peace of the world must be assured during the whole period of disarmament, and I, therefore, propose a fourth step concurrent with and wholly dependent on the faithful fulfillment of these three proposals and subject to existing treaty rights:

That all the nations of the world should enter into a solemn and definite pact of nonaggression. That they should solemnly reaffirm the obligations they have assumed to limit and reduce their armaments, and, provided these obligations are faithfully executed by all signatory powers, individually agree that they will send no armed force of whatsoever nature across their frontiers.

Common sense points out that if any strong nation refuses to join with genuine sincerity in these concerted efforts for political and economic peace—the one at Geneva and the other at London—progress can be obstructed and ultimately blocked. In such event the civilized world, seeking both forms of peace, will know where the responsibility for failure lies. I urge that no nation assume such a responsibility, and that all the nations joined in these great conferences translate their professed policies into action. This is the way to political and economic peace.

I trust that your Government will join in the fulfillment of these hopes.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he intends to conclude the bill tonight?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I hope to complete the bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. Let me say that there are a number of important amendments to be offered to the bill, and they will take some time. I am told that there are several gentlemen on the other side of the aisle who are inclined to press for a yea-and-nay vote, to show the sentiment of the House. I agree with them. If that is true, we will be here some time after 6 o'clock. I should like to ask the gentleman if we cannot agree on some time for adjournment?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am sorry I cannot enter into any agreement, and I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman look forward to a 5 o'clock adjournment?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am looking forward to pass the bill tonight.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the composition of the United States Navy with respect to the categories of vessels limited by the treaties signed at Washington, February 6, 1922, and at London, April 22, 1930, is hereby established at the limit prescribed by those treaties.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The annual naval appropriation bill was passed in this House last week without opposition. Together with the other Members of the House I voted for this bill because I believed that it was proper to maintain our present Navy and to make needed repairs, and perhaps also such additions as that bill carried. I believe also that there are many Members of the House who, at the time we passed the annual appropriation bill, did not understand the contemplated enormous increase in the Navy and the extensive program of naval building projects which this committee is attempting to foist upon the country for the next 6 or 7 years. This bill should be called the billion dollar navy bill. The bill which we passed last week carried, on the face of it, an appropriation of over $295,000,000, but it also carried with it, under the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act and from the Public Works Administration, further appropriations, in effect bringing up the total amount to $441,000,000 for further naval purposes.

This bill, to bring the Navy up to full treaty strength, commits us to a further program of naval building in an amount estimated by the Assistant Secretary of the Navy as $475,000,000. We have already 54 ships in process of construction and it is proposed to put $475,000,000 into additional ships.

This bill was characterized by Admiral Standley, at the hearing of the Naval Affairs Committee, as "The most important naval legislation since the war", yet, in the consideration of this bill by the committee, a bill effecting such purposes as have already stimulated naval building on the part of Great Britain and have caused her to increase her program, and which is causing distrust in Japan, in the consideration of the bill, I say, no one was called during the too short, perfunctory hearing to testify as to the conditions warranting this tremendous program or to give the views of the people of the country, those who are going to pay the bills, except the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and three or four naval officers. No one else was invited or given an opportunity to be heard before the committee. A bill so greatly affecting our relations with the other countries of the world, involving in effect an expenditure, together with the naval appropriation of nearly $1,000,000,000, was rushed through without adequate hearing and it was even proposed to attach it to the naval appropriation bill as a rider or amendment to the bill and it was only through the fact that there were certain Members of the House who would have made a point of order against it that this plan of rushing it through before any opposition could develop, and before any of the true facts could be learned, was abandoned. I wonder how many Members of the House, when they voted, as I did, for the naval appropriation bill, understood that this naval parity bill would be brought on at the present session, involving an additional supplemental appropriation this year of possibly sixty or sixty-five millions of dollars more and in addition to this we were committing ourselves to a further expenditure for additions to the Navy of nearly a half billion dollars more during the next 7 years.

In addition to this there are other serious questions, developed even from the testimony of the naval officers before the committee, gravely affecting the question of our compliance with the provisions of the Washington and London Treaties about which there was no adequate discussion and about which it was evident from the testimony before the committee there is a great disagreement as between naval experts, members of the State Department, and others who have made a study of those treaties; for example, with respect to the building of flying-deck cruisers, evidently a departure. Admiral Standley testified:

There are many questions involved here. There is a question of legality under the treaty as to whether we can build them or not.

This is only one out of many considerations affecting our treaty relations, affecting international good will and affecting the question as to whether or not we are not stimulating and inciting a race in naval building competition to which not the slightest consideration was given.

I wonder how many Members of the House know that we already have more money invested in our Navy than has any other country in the world? And again I am citing figures given by Admiral Standley, who obviously was testifying as an advocate of a big navy, and I call your attention to the figures given by the admiral at page 205 of the committee hearings. I appreciate that this bill is brought here under the claim that it has the backing and approval of the President. In this instance, at least, that is not with me a determinating factor; but I call your attention to the letter submitted by the Director of the Budget, attached to the committee report, in which there appears the following significant sentence, which reads as follows:

We are advised that insofar as the financial program of the President is concerned, there is no objection to submitting this proposed legislation to Congress for its consideration.

This does not sound to me as indicating an enthusiastic commitment to this enormous naval building program on the part of the President.

I cannot conscientiously vote for this measure. I well realize the futility of attempting to change the mind, or convince against their will, the advocates of the big stick, the advocates of a show or demonstration of force, or those who believe that we should have a Navy second to none. Given an opportunity for a fair presentation of the facts, it can be shown that we now have a Navy equal to that of Great Britain and far superior to any other. But, of course, if you mean here by a Navy second to none a Navy sufficient to meet and overcome the navies of any combination of powers that might conceivably be alined against us, that would involve a continuation of a naval building program such as not only would be never ending, but, in my opinion—and I say also not merely in my opinion but in the light of history—would constitute the greatest incitement to war. Against whom do we need such a Navy? Surely not against Great Britain. The only effect of this contemplated program upon Great Britain has been to stimulate activity on her part in order to keep up with us. The only effect of this program upon Japan has been to stimulate the militaristic party in that country. The history of the world has shown that the best way, the most effective way, to secure war, the most potent way to cause war, bring on war, is to talk war, prepare for war. I believe that there is grave danger of war in Europe.

I trust that we may never become again involved in a great war. Another World War, in the mind of any competent observer, according to the testimony of the greatest military authorities in the world, will not only be far more costly, far more destructive, far more ghastly in all its consequences than the late World War but will mean the wiping out of the most valuable part of our civilization and the entailing of suffering and privation and want, stunted minds and stunted bodies in our children and our children's children. I am not a pacifist nor do I come from a race of pacifists, but I could wish that those who are urging us to prepare for war—the armament makers, the munitions manufacturers, those who made their millions during the World War, and those who are profiting from all countries and on both sides by the stimulation of a race in armament, as well as the big Navy propagandists here in Washington—would be drafted to bear the brunt of war instead of our boys and the boys from the other countries of the world.

A study of the causes of wars that have heretofore cursed the world, a study of the results accomplished by those wars, will clearly demonstrate in the true light of history that no lasting good, no permanent benefit, nothing in fact but poverty and suffering, racked bodies, and racked minds and souls remain as the result of war, and I claim, Mr. Speaker, that in the present stage of the world's civilization, no people will ever willingly involve themselves or their neighbors in war if the vote were left to them to determine upon war, and that no war will, or ever can be again, justified except such a war as might be fought by some people to relieve themselves of tyranny or oppression, a war fought in the exercise of what Jefferson called "The sacred right of revolution."

There were in this country during the past year over a quarter million children of school age who had no schools to attend, who were deprived of a year of their education by reason of lack of funds and of the bankruptcy of many of our municipalities and school districts. There were thousands of teachers who went for many months without pay. Our farmers are bowed down with unremunerative toil and suffering under the burden of debt and of the enormous taxes upon their farms. Less than a year ago there were in this country 12,000,000 men willing to work who were unemployed. There is grave question whether our taxpayers, already bled white with taxation, can or will carry the weight of the maintenance of a sufficient Public Works program to furnish further employment. We are still failing either to provide proper employment or furnish charity sufficient to relieve the wide-spread suffering from lack of decent food and clothing. We are still failing, in many of our States, to provide proper school facilities for our children. The menace of an underfed, uneducated generation may come to constitute a far greater danger to our peace, to the maintenance of our existing order, to the maintenance of our form of government itself than any danger from any of the other great powers of the world arising through the lack of a Navy "second to none."

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It has been said that a strong army and navy are the best defense against war. They are as long as other countries continue to build navies and organize armies. We have no other way out of it. The fact that the other nations of the world did not see fit to follow the President's request for a general disarmament makes this action necessary. I do want to call the attention of the House to the cost of our Navy program. I am going to vote for this bill. I am going to follow the President. I do not always follow him. I follow him when I agree with him, and when I do not I do as I think the folks back home want me to do. This Congress is trying to cooperate with the President in his general program of social reclamation and national defense. The cost of our naval program will be approximately $293,000,000 as provided in the naval appropriation bill, and $276,000,000 that is provided for naval purposes under the Public Works Administration, and approximately $475,000,000 that we are authorizing under this bill, all of which amounts to $1,044,000,000. How the Membership is charged with patriotism when they rise up in defense of this bill! And so am I. We are all patriotic. Patriotism is one of the noblest motives that a human being has in his heart, but it is also capitalized on by people who would use that motive for their own personal gain. This bill should be amended to limit the profit to be made out of the construction of the warships and aircraft authorized in this bill.

While I was not overseas during the last war, I was not drafted into the service, either. I enlisted, and so did my brother, the only members of our family of eligible age. While all the Members are yelling that they are patriotic, that they want to defend the country, that they do not want to send soldiers abroad in old ships—and I hope that we never send them abroad again—still I should like to see them all march right up to the Clerk's desk and affix their signatures to the Patman bill, H.R. 1, and reward the patriots of the last war, and put their signatures on the resolution to "pay the veterans' adjusted-service certificates in cash now." That will partially square the last war's debt and put money in circulation among the people at the bottom of the heap and help recovery. I want to pay for the last war before I go into another.

When I go home and attend my veterans' meeting, I want to be able to walk up to the altar and salute my commander and say that I have not broken faith. Yes; I voted against the administration on the economy bill. I gave my solemn word to the citizens of my city that I would do that very thing. I only kept my promise and voted my convictions on that bill.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Yes.

Mr. DUNN. How many signatures are there on the petition for the consideration of the Patman bill?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. We had 3 more from Michigan today, making a total of 75 signatures to date, and I hope Michigan gets patriotic 100 percent in keeping faith with the soldiers of the last war. Before we get through I think we will.

Mr. DUNN. And I hope that Pennsylvania does likewise.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I voted against the economy bill and against the gag rule, but I am with the President and the administration. I have reason to believe the President does not want legislation considered under gag rules. We want economy, yes; but we want economy by cutting out useless expenditures and bureaus. I shall vote for the bill because national defense is necessary; but when I get home, I want to be able to walk down the street and look my people in the eye and say that I kept faith. I hope that others who are yelling patriotism now can go before the folks back home and say that they also kept faith. [Applause.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a couple of questions with reference to section 2. It is my understanding of the language in the last four or five lines in section 2 that the law confers upon the President the right to build these various ships if he sees fit to do so.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is correct.

Mr. BOILEAU. Either before December 31, 1936, or at any time thereafter, so that there is no good purpose served by having the language "December 31, 1936", in the bill at all.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The reason is that the London Treaty expires on December 31, 1936.

Mr. BOILEAU. And he has the right under the provisions of this bill to build ships at any time he sees fit to do so.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. As long as Congress appropriates the money for it.

Mr. BOILEAU. But he has a right to obligate the Government.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Not until Congress has first passed an appropriation to permit an obligation to be entered into.

Mr. BOILEAU. This is the usual authorization that goes to any agency of the Government to carry on work, and this gives him the power to do so 20 years from now, if these ships are not built by that time.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The 1916 building program was just finished last year. We authorized ships in 1916 and the Director of the Budget and Congress did not appropriate the money to finish the last of them until the last session. We hope that this program will be commenced in a moderate way in the fiscal year 1935, and that the President will ask Congress to appropriate sufficient money to commence laying down 20 ships, and that the building of them will extend over a period of 8 years.

Mr. BOILEAU. The point I am trying to bring out is this: As I understand it, by the enactment of this bill, if we pass it, if it is passed by Congress and approved by the President, Congress at least will never again have anything to say about the number of ships that shall be in the Navy.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Oh, yes; it will.

Mr. BOILEAU. Except by way of appropriation.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is correct.

Mr. BOILEAU. Legislation is being enacted now for the future. We are giving Presidents of the future the power to carry on a program, and Congress will not legislate further except insofar as making appropriations is concerned.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. We will not be required, if this goes through, to come in here every year or every 2 years and ask for an authorization bill, but we are confined to the number of ships by tonnage restricted by the treaties, and as long as these treaties or similar treaties are in force, then the President or the Congress cannot go beyond those treaties.

Mr. BOILEAU. With reference to the proviso in line 16, on page 2, it provides that after the treaty expires in 1936 the President can, if he desires, undertake to construct battleships, does it not, without coming to Congress for further legislation?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Under the treaty, no battleship can be commenced or replaced until after 1936. The President cannot replace a single ship until Congress authorizes the money for him to do so.

Mr. BOILEAU. But we are now authorizing him to undertake to construct those ships if he sees fit to do so.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Not at all; not at all. The Congress continues to control the rapidity with which the ships will be built, and the rate at which they will be built, and the amount of money that each may cost. In other words, we control absolutely, on the recommendation of the President, the rapidity of this building.

Mr. BOILEAU. I believe the gentleman will agree that this language on page 2, line 4, reads:

> The President of the United States is hereby authorized to undertake to construct—

And then follow the vessels that he can undertake to construct.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Of course he cannot construct until Congress makes an appropriation.

Mr. BOILEAU. But this bill authorizes him to undertake to construct. That is the language of the bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Well, that means that he will authorize the Budget to make recommendation to Congress, but this body will control how fast the ships will be built. It is absolutely retained in this body, just like any other appropriation.

Mr. BOILEAU. But this matter will never come before the legislative committees of the House, but will only be dealt with by the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Now, the gentleman is correct, exactly.

Mr. HASTINGS. In other words, it is a continuing authorization.

Mr. BOILEAU. It is a continuing authorization, permitting the President, in the future, 20 years from now, to arrange the terms for the construction of our Navy and not bring it upon the floor of the House, except insofar as we approve or disapprove of appropriations.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. We place in the President complete authority to make recommendations to the Appropriations Committee, and the legislative committee will have nothing further to do with it.

Mr. BOILEAU. That is permanent and not temporary, and we are hereby surrendering the power that the Congress has previously enjoyed.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. You are not surrendering one single thing. The legislative committee is delegating its authority to the President to make his recommendation to the Bureau of the Budget, and the Congress will make the appropriation.

Mr. BOILEAU. Then the gentleman takes the position that this bill does nothing?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Oh, yes; this bill does a great deal.

Mr. BOILEAU. Then whatever the bill does is a surrender of power on the part of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 2. That subject to the provisions of the treaties signed at Washington, February 6, 1922, and at London, April 22, 1930, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to undertake prior to December 31, 1936, or as soon thereafter as he may deem it advisable (in addition to the five cruisers not yet constructed under the act approved Feb. 13, 1929 (45 Stat. 1165), and in addition to the vessels being constructed pursuant to Executive Order No. 6174 of June 16, 1933), the construction of: (a) One aircraft carrier of approximately 15,000 tons standard displacement, to replace the experimental aircraft carrier Langley; (b) 99,200 tons aggregate of destroyers to replace over-age destroyers; (c) 35,530 tons aggregate of submarines to replace over-age submarines: Provided, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to replace, by vessels of modern design and construction, vessels in the Navy in the categories limited by the treaties signed at Washington, February 6, 1922, and at London, April 22, 1930, when their replacement is permitted by the said treaties.

With the following committee amendment:

> Page 2, line 6, strike out the word "five", and insert in lieu thereof the word "six."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Committee amendment offered by Mr. VINSON of Georgia: Page 2, line 21, after the word "treaties", change the period to a colon, and add: "Provided further, That the President is hereby authorized to procure the necessary naval aircraft for vessels and other naval purposes in numbers commensurate with the treaty navy."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit to the Clerk a letter from the Director of the Budget, which I ask to be read, with reference to the amendment I have just offered.

The clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 27, 1934.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have your letters of January 23 and 26, 1934, regarding proposed legislation to authorize the construction of aircraft for the Navy and Marine Corps in addition to the existing authorized 1,000-plane program.

You were advised on January 17, 1934, that there was no objection to the draft proposed by your letter of December 18, 1933, seeking general legislation to authorize the President to construct the necessary naval vessels to build the Navy up to treaty strength, together with the necessary replacements to maintain it at such strength. Such proposed legislation is now embodied in bill H.R. 6604. It appears that general authority to construct the necessary planes for vessels and other naval purposes not covered by the 1,000-plane program might well be incorporated in such proposed legislation by adding a proviso at the end of section 2 thereof authorizing the President to provide aircraft for vessels and other purposes in the numbers commensurate with a treaty Navy. Such action would seem preferable to that specifying limitations as to total number of planes or as to numbers of planes and costs thereof by years, since experience indicates that airplane requirements, financial, and international conditions, and other factors involved cannot be fairly estimated for even so short a period as 5 years.

You are advised, however, that insofar as the financial program of the President is concerned, there is no objection to your submitting to Congress for its consideration either the drafts of legislation proposed in your letters of January 23 and 26, or a modified draft embodying general authorization along the lines suggested above. It is deemed proper to state that, if such legislation be enacted into law, no commitment can now be made as to when and at what rate of progress the construction of the additional aircraft so authorized may be undertaken.

Very truly yours,

L. W. DOUGLAS, Director.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, D.C.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state briefly what this proposed amendment is. It is merely to delegate complete authority to the President in the usual way of making recommendations, through the Budget, to Congress, to provide for the necessary airplanes that must accompany these ships that are now being built, and ships that are provided for in this bill.

In the appropriation bill passed last week appropriation was made for the construction of some 54 ships. It will require approximately 650 airplanes to take care of those ships. In this program now under consideration, which calls for the construction of 102 ships, it will require in the neighborhood of 534 airplanes. So this amendment merely permits the President, in his discretion, to make recommendations to Congress as to the rapidity with which Congress shall make appropriations for the airplanes necessary for the new ships that are being constructed, and for the three airplane carriers.

In 1926 we established a 5-year aviation program. We now have 1,000 airplanes connected with the fleet. This will bring it up to 2,184, necessary to be used in the various units of the fleet. Since this matter has the sanction of the Budget and meets with the financial approval of the Executive, I ask that the amendment be adopted to provide for the necessary airplanes as these ships are being built.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, as far as I can tell, and I followed the hearings very closely, there should be no objection whatever to the adoption of this amendment.

The planes authorized in this amendment are just as important to the ships now under construction or which may be constructed under the so-called "Vinson bill", which is before the House today, just as important to those ships as are the guns on those ships or the ammunition on those ships or the range finders on those ships. All our larger ships carry airplanes of various types. The cruisers carry 4 planes ready for flight and 4 additional planes in the knock-down. Additional motors for each plane are also purchased. For every airplane motor we buy with the plane we buy an additional half motor. In other words, for every 2 engines we buy 1 additional engine, which is carried in storage as extra or spare equipment. These planes will be purchased from time to time by the Federal Government as the ships to which they ultimately will be assigned are completed. They are part of the ships. Without them the ships would, of course, be tremendously handicapped.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does it not seem rather contradictory to spend millions of dollars to build immense ships when we have to put airplanes aboard the ship to keep the ship from being destroyed by airplanes? Why not simply build more airplanes?

Mr. BRITTEN. How would the gentleman get the airplanes to sea?

Mr. O'MALLEY. By airplane carriers.

Mr. BRITTEN. But the airplane carriers must be protected. An airplane carrier is very vulnerable. Incidentally, I am one of those who feel that antiaircraft attack has made greater progress in the last 5 years than has aircraft offense or attack.

Mr. Chairman, today with our antiaircraft gun—and they are big guns; they are 5-inch guns, almost as long as from where I stand to the Chairman himself, they are 20 feet long; they keep the attacking enemy planes up in the air 3 miles or more; and they keep chasing them very, very hard. With the retarded-action fuse that is in the shell fired by that gun, the shell does not explode until it gets pretty nearly 3 miles in the air, and then it becomes a shotgun loaded with shrapnel. My personal impression is that antiaircraft attack has gone ahead faster than aircraft offense, and I do not believe our ships at sea, the ships themselves being very fast, having aircraft aboard to protect them, as well as antiaircraft guns—I do not think we need fear the destruction of these ships on the high seas from plane attack; provided, of course, we also have planes in the air to attack the enemy planes. It is not presumed that we will send an airplane carrier out alone. A plane carrier by itself would be useless, almost defenseless. It would never be sent out alone. The big fighting ships would go out with the plane carrier.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be unanimously adopted. It is a good amendment and the planes for which it provides are as much a part of the ships as the guns and ammunition.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, once more on behalf of the people of the United States I want to protest against this bill. A few days ago we appropriated $274,000,000 for the Navy; and along with that another $278,000,000, I understand, is being provided from Public Works funds, this, too, for naval construction; and today we are authorizing a program that will cost another $380,000,000. Various Members who have spoken on the floor today have estimated that the cost will run to $470,000,000 because of increased cost of material.

All this material is being wasted. The naval officials, men who know the subject, have testified and have written that in the Battle of Jutland, the latest of the world's great sea battles, the ships could not communicate with each other by radio because of the turmoil, because of electric motors, because of the roar and blare of guns, the terrific noise of the battle, and so forth and so on, radio communication between the ships was absolutely destroyed and impossible. Most of the ships that were sunk in that battle were sunk by running into each other in the dense clouds of smoke. [Laughter.] That is what will happen in the next battle, the ships and the planes will run into each other because they cannot see through the smoke. We are just wasting this money. If, as the worthy proponent of the bill, the gentleman from Illinois, suggests, so much progress has been made in antiaircraft guns, then all we need do is to plant antiaircraft guns along our coast line. Not only will the antiaircraft guns shoot farther from shore than from the deck of a ship, but they can be fired with greater regularity and with far better accuracy.

I believe it is a crime, a crime against humanity, to spend all this money while our people here are starving to death and our boys and girls are being kept out of school because of lack of clothing and lack of food in a land which is blessed with an abundance of everything. It is nothing short of crime and shame. Another thing: Why all this great preparedness right now? Why follow William Randolph Hearst because he prefers to run war pictures and stir up war hysteria, such as was stirred up in 1917, to plunge us into another holocaust and catastrophe?

What are the plans? Why, there came to me—I do not know how official it is—information that a certain gentleman was asked by the "brain trust" here a few days ago to be the head of a great national Federal patrol system of 300,000 soldiers. What does it mean? Let me say that the same thing happened in Russia before Lenin. It happened in Italy before Mussolini. It is always a step preceding dictatorship. Is that what we are coming to in America? Are we authorizing all this armed strength to back up a dictatorship?

I ask you if today you are going to sound the deathknell of democracy and cast aside all that is high and holy and desecrate the very blood upon which this Capitol stands, blood spilled by patriots who fought and died that we might have a democracy and a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

I wish I had 4 hours to go on with this argument. [Laughter.] Oh, yes; laugh, if you please; laugh, if you please; but sometimes those who laugh last laugh best. In 1917 you scoffed and laughed at the name of Robert M. La Follette. You tried to drive him from the United States Senate. Today those who scoffed and maligned him are dead, rotten, and forgotten in their graves. Today he stands immortal in the hearts of real Americans. Under the very dome of this Capitol he has been honored by the placing of his statue in Statuary Hall, the Hall of Fame, time and history proved that he was right and the American Hohenzollerns and Junkers were wrong. History will record him among the greatest of American patriots and statesmen. He was sneered at and laughed at, and it was just another case of where history has repeated itself, as history again will do. La Follette laughed last.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois: Page 2, line 21, after the committee amendment just adopted, strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following: "Provided further, That the first and each succeeding alternate vessel of each category, except the 15,000-ton aircraft carrier, upon which work is undertaken, and the main engines, armor, and armament for such vessels, the construction and manufacture of which is authorized by this act, shall be constructed or manufactured in the Government navy yards, naval stations, naval gun factories, naval ordnance plants, or arsenals of the United States, except such material or parts as were not customarily manufactured in such Government plants prior to February 13, 1929."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit for the information of the Members a substitute which I propose to offer and will ask the gentleman if it will not take the place of the one the gentleman has offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by the committee: Section 5, appearing on page 3 after line 9 of the printed bill: "That so far as practical vessels constructed under the authorization of this act shall be built on the basis of one half in the navy yards and one half in private shipyards, the final decision in each case to be at the discretion of the President."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the reason I ask that this substitute be adopted is because I am thoroughly in accord with the idea that one half should go to the navy yards and one half to industrial yards. That is exactly what is happening today. One half of the ships are constructed in the navy yards and one half are built in industrial yards. Under the gentleman's amendment it may be impossible to carry this out, due to the fact that the navy yards may be crowded with work of a certain character which would interfere with the program.

For instance, only yesterday the Secretary of the Treasury and the Navy Department entered into contracts for the construction of seven Coast Guard ships. When you put these seven Coast Guard ships in a certain navy yard it may be impossible to follow out that amendment.

We seek to do the same identical thing. We want one half of them to go to the navy yards and one half to go to industrial yards, but I say, leave it to the President to determine, because it might happen that it would be impossible to utilize the yards on the west coast, due to the fact that ships may have to be overhauled out there while the ships were in that section. I think the amendment I am offering would accomplish identically the same thing and would be far better than the amendment which the gentleman from Illinois has suggested.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the chairman's position in the matter, but I note the gentleman does not recognize any of the arsenals of the United States. These arsenals in many cases have hundreds of employees who are on furlough and who have shared liberally in the past in the building of some of this naval armament. The chairman mentions navy yards. In that the gentleman and I can agree, but beyond that I do not feel as though I should accept the amendment offered by the committee. I would prefer to present my amendment to the committee for decision.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I trust the Committee will vote this amendment down. This is along the same line as the amendment heretofore known as the "Dillinger amendment." I am thoroughly in accord with every principle of the amendment, but I do think it is far better to accomplish it in the manner I have suggested in the substitute which I will propose just as soon as the House votes on this pending amendment.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. In one minute. I know what every one of you is interested in, and I am just as much concerned about it as you are, but if you are not careful you are not going to accomplish what you desire. You want work for your navy yards. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that one half of them should be constructed there, but if the language of the gentleman's amendment is put in the bill it will restrict the activities of the navy yards because they will become congested with work and this will slow up the entire program. Under the substitute amendment which I propose you will take care of the navy yards by giving them one half of the work.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. Does not the gentleman feel that the 12 navy yards we have in this country have sufficient facilities to take care of the building of one half of the vessels authorized by this program?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Of course not, and I will make this further statement. It is absolutely necessary to build ships in the navy yards, and I am for building them there, because we have got to maintain our navy yards. However, as a matter of fact, you can build these ships a great deal cheaper under competitive bids in industrial yards, but it is highly important to retain the navy yards to act as a leverage on the industrial yards, and to take care of these employees I am willing and shall be glad to see them obtain one half of all of this work. I do think the President should allocate the work, one half of it to navy yards and one half to industrial yards.

Mr. HEALEY. If the gentleman will yield further, will the gentleman assure us that the navy yards will be worked to their full capacity in connection with this program?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The navy yards today have one half of the 54 ships now being constructed without a line on the statute books to make the Navy Department do so. The Navy Department has testified before the committee that it will carry out the spirit of Congress with reference to the Dallinger amendment, irrespective of any mandate of the Congress.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. I favor the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois because I feel that the bill should contain definite language requiring that at least half of the vessels authorized under this bill should be constructed in Government navy yards and that the armament and guns should be constructed in Government arsenals.

Our Government has an investment of $2,000,000,000 in the navy yards of this country and their equipment and facilities, and I feel that the yards should be used in connection with this great naval program to the fullest extent of their capacity and that also the facilities of our arsenals should be employed to the fullest capacity.

Other great powers construct their naval vessels and equipment in government plants. We should do likewise, so that we may be sure that this work will be done by our own citizens—mechanics, skilled and trained, who know how to do this type of work accurately and expertly, and under the supervision of our own officers, and who are likewise skilled in naval construction. The citizens of this country have an enormous investment in our navy yards and arsenals. These plants should not be allowed to deteriorate by lack of use. Neither should the skill of our workers in navy yards and arsenals be allowed to be lost because of idleness. It is necessary that we should keep these branches of our national defense supplied with work to the end that both the establishments and the workers may be maintained at a high standard of fitness and efficiency in preparedness for any unforseen emergency that may arise.

Many of the trained and skilled workers at the Government plants are now idle because they have been furloughed or, in thousands of cases, entirely separated from the service because of lack of work.

I believe that our Army and Navy should not be built up or maintained so that great private corporations may receive profits at the expense of the taxpayers. As much as possible of this work should be allotted to our Government navy yards and arsenals, so as to assure that these plants will be employed to the fullest capacity. I am, therefore, in accord with the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, because it will guarantee that these plants will be used to their full capacity; and I have also submitted an amendment to accomplish this same end.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. May I ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think his substitute offered for the amendment that is now pending should be modified so as to provide that in case of necessity or emergency the President might divert the work, and let the amendment go through in that way?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The substitute I have offered leaves it absolutely to the President. We are leaving this entire program to the President. The President makes the recommendation to Congress, and we are leaving the allocation of these ships to him.

Let me show how this might work out. Some of these ships are airplane carriers and some are destroyers and some submarines, and under the gentleman's amendment a navy yard might get a submarine and an industrial yard might get an airplane carrier.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes in order to answer these questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. So I hope you will accept my substitute in lieu of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMPSON]. We are trying to accomplish the same thing identically, but if you adopt the gentleman's amendment it is liable to slow up this building program.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The substitute provides for one half of the construction in private shipyards. Would the gentleman accept an amendment to his amendment that all ships should be built in Government yards except those that the President decided could not be built there within the proper time?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No. I cannot accept that, because it would cost too much to do that.

Mr. BRITTEN. The Government yards are not equipped to do that.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Of course not. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. I hope the amendment suggested by my colleague from Illinois will be defeated, because it will not accomplish the very thing the gentleman is after. At the present moment all the guns for these cruisers and destroyers and submarines will be made in the Washington Navy Yard. The gentleman wants to take that work away from the navy yard and divide it among a lot of private yards, which today are not equipped for such work. This would cost more money, and I cannot understand the gentleman's logic in aiming to do the very thing which is contrary to the principle of his amendment. All of these guns are to be manufactured by the Government, and the gentleman's amendment would provide that half of them must be made in some private plant.

I am in favor of the Vinson amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. In just a moment. I am trying to accomplish the identical thing the gentleman is, and my amendment will accomplish it, while the gentleman's amendment will retard the program.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. I would agree with the gentleman, provided he would include arsenals that are equipped to do this work and put them in the same category as navy yards.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] has answered that question absolutely. The Navy does not go to arsenals for its equipment. It goes to the navy yards, and if you want this work done in the Washington Navy Yard or in the navy yards that build armament, then you should vote for my amendment, because it will give them the work.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. I beg the gentleman's pardon, some of the arsenals of the War Department are today contracting to do this work for the Navy Department, and that is what I am directly interested in.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment be again reported?

The Clerk again read the pending amendment.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, can we have the substitute again read?

The Clerk again read the substitute.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to disagree on this amendment with my distinguished friend from Georgia, the chairman of the committee, of whom I am very fond, but the very language of the two amendments, the Vinson amendment and the Thompson amendment, explain why the Thompson amendment should pass. In the Vinson amendment we have the words "as far as is practicable." I am getting so that I am very much afraid of those words. They leave too much to the discretion of one individual. My own Committee on Labor plainly wrote into the Wagner-Peyser bill that in every place where there was to be an employment office there should be a veterans' employment office, and we did not say "as far as practicable", either. Yet even after making plain just what Congress wanted done clearly and without equivocation, the law is being simply disregarded and the poor veteran left to shift for himself.

If that can happen when the law is plain, what can we expect from Government departments when we put into legislation words like "as far as practicable"? They will do anything they like then with the law. Let us tell them what Congress wants done and then insist that they observe the law.

Now, in building these vessels, the first cruiser should go to a navy yard and the next to a private yard, the first destroyer to a navy yard and the next one to a private yard, and so on.

The President more than anyone realizes the need of keeping up the standards of our navy yards. If in time of war you want a navy yard prepared to fit your ships for war and keep them fit, then you must be ready, and to be prepared you must keep your yards constantly at work and well equipped. You must have them ready to handle ships and build ships and recondition ships to put them into commission again, and they must be ready to handle any ship that will come into that navy yard at a moment's notice.

If you want to protect the country and have real national defense, you have to build at least half of the ships in the navy yards and give work to the arsenals, and the only way to do it is by this amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. Have the first and every alternate ship built in the navy yards and have real navy yards.

Under the other amendment you will have some Navy official saying, "We will build the first 60 in the private yards and the next 60, if at all, in the navy yards."

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is confusing the issue. The amendment of my colleague from Illinois would do the very thing the gentleman is talking against. The gentleman is arguing for the navy yards and he has a navy yard in his district.

Mr. CONNERY. No. I have many constituents who work in the Charlestown Navy Yard at Boston. The Charlestown Navy Yard is in the district of my friend and colleague, Mr. DOUGLASS, who has been ill. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY], whose district ends right at the edge of the navy yard, had ready a similar amendment to that offered by Mr. THOMPSON, but graciously yielded to the gentleman from Illinois to offer his amendment, as they both sought the same end—to strengthen the Navy by keeping the navy yards up to their highest efficiency at all times.

Mr. BRITTEN. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois would tear down the navy yards.

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, no.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is what it would do, if you take the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. CONNERY. No; it would not.

I dislike to take up the time of the House, but I feel keenly on this matter. I can see where the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia almost covers the situation, but, to my mind, it does not entirely. I am getting to the point where I believe that Congress ought to write into a law just exactly what it means [applause], so that no one down in the Department can say, as I have remarked before, we will build 50 ships now in the private shipyards and then 50 ships some other time in the navy yards, under the plea that that is economy. I am for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMPSON].

Mr. O'MALLEY. And is not that one way to take the profit out of building up these ships and guns?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; absolutely; and keep men working at a decent living wage in the navy yards.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. We heard the arguments by the committee members that they were not so anxious to get the biggest Navy in the world within a year, that it would come about gradually. Does the gentleman not think that the Navy could cooperate in the 5 or 10 years in the Navy building program and do its part.

Mr. CONNERY. I think in those 5 or 10 years to which my friend from Michigan refers you can build up those navy yards into a wonderful national-defense proposition. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will be agreed to. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I believe in all fairness to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. THOMPSON] that we should go back just a little bit to the colloquy that occurred between the proponents of this bill some 10 days ago, when they said to this House that one of the purposes of the program was to distribute the benefits among the various instrumentalities in the country, so that the people living out in our country, where we have an arsenal, might benefit as a result of this construction program. My colleagues on the Republican side of the House told the House that it would make work in various portions of the country. If I understand the amendment correctly, it means nothing more than that out in the arsenal in Rock Island we shall share proportionately with the other points of the country in this building program. After all that is the substance of the amendment.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is what mine provides.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There can be nothing unfair about the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. The chairman's amendment, however, contains the saving clause, "insofar as practicable."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. In the discretion of the President.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That vests the discretion in one man and it does not write it into the law, it does not assure the people back home that they are going to get some of the benefits. It only resolves itself upon the generosity of one man. I think, after all, that we should vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMPSON] and scatter the benefits to all corners of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANCHARD) there were—ayes 140, noes 93.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to submit annually to the Bureau of the Budget estimates for the construction of the foregoing vessels; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. VINSON of Georgia: On page 2, line 24, after the word "vessels", insert the words "and aircraft."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I have sent to the desk.

Amendment offered by Mr. HASTINGS: On page 3, line 2, after the word "necessary", insert "not to exceed $380,000,000."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I want to have the serious attention of the members of the committee on this amendment. This is an amendment to section 3. As this section now reads, there is no limit to the authorization, and if this amendment is adopted it adds the words "not to exceed $380,000,000", after the word "necessary." In other words, it limits the authorization to the amount that was indicated would be necessary to complete this program.

Let me say that as far as I know there has been no bill making similar authorization, that has not had a limitation in it. There has been no exception to that, as far as I know. You will remember that last spring when we were enacting the recovery program plan and a bill was brought in here to feed the hungry and distressed and to make work for the people throughout the country, there was a limit to the authorization of $3,300,000,000. The Committee on Appropriations could not go beyond that amount, because it would be subject to a point of order. That is true, as far as I know, of all other authorization bills. I have inserted $380,000,000 because that is the amount it is estimated will be required to build this program.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. HASTINGS. Now, if the gentleman will wait until he gets authority to interfere. That is what the gentleman who presented the rule said.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Well, the gentleman was in error.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the gentleman from Georgia is out of order.

Now, this authorization has no limit whatever; and let me say to you there is no end to this. This is a continuing authorization. It not only runs to complete the program of the London Treaty, but it permits the President to replace those ships for all time to come. It is a continuing authorization. The sky is the limit. Let me say to you people who live out West, you just take the bridle off and if this amendment or a similar amendment is not adopted, let me say to you there is no further need of a legislative Naval Affairs Committee. I am opposed in principle to legislating and authorizing without placing any limit whatever on the amount. All that this amendment does is to place a limitation upon the amount of the authorization. It is something which, as I said a moment ago, has been followed in all cases. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I will not trespass upon your time for more than 5 minutes. At the very outset, as said in the beginning of this debate today, this is an administration measure. It has the unqualified endorsement of the administration. It was so testified by the representative of the executive branch, Colonel Roosevelt, when he appeared before the committee.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the National Recovery Act was an administration measure.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Now, the gentleman from Oklahoma is out of order. [Laughter.] The effort of the gentleman from Oklahoma is to curtail the effort of the administration to bring the Navy up to treaty strength. It is estimated from the best possible source at this time, if costs prevail in the future as they have in the past, that it would cost about $380,000,000; but Colonel Roosevelt said distinctly that you must add at least 25 percent more to the $380,000,000. Then, the House has just adopted an amendment to provide for 1,143 airplanes. Just think of it! One hundred and twenty ships and 1,143 airplanes, and the gentleman from Oklahoma proposes to permit the Government to only spend $380,000,000. Of course, if you do not want this program, there is a far better way to end it than this way, and that is to vote strictly against this program. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma is adopted, you have scuttled this program, because it will be out of the question to bring the Navy up to treaty strength with an expenditure of only $380,000,000. We leave absolutely to Congress the amount that it will cost. Every year the Congress will appropriate the money. If business comes back like it was 2 years ago, it will not cost as much, but if business continues to advance and labor receives its just hire, then it will cost probably more than what we estimate today. So I ask this Committee to vote down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma. It strikes at the very heart of this bill, if you propose to maintain the Navy with airplanes and ships at treaty strength.

I ask for a vote on the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all debate on the amendment has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. McFARLANE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 5 minutes.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HASTINGS) there were—ayes 51, noes 146.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. HASTINGS: Page 3, line 2, after the word "necessary", insert the following: "Not to exceed $475,000,000."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, the only difference between this amendment and the last one is that the former amendment limited the authorization to $380,000,000. After the fervent appeal made by the Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs that it was necessary to have a leeway of 25 percent, and the first amendment having been defeated, I have modified my amendment and increased the amount from $380,000,000 to the maximum claimed by anybody as being necessary to be expended under this program, $475,000,000.

The chairman of the committee appeals to the House that this is the President's program. So was the National Recovery Act of last spring, and so have been mostly all the legislation that has been enacted by Congress; and let me remind you that in every one of those legislative bills we placed a limitation on the amount that may be expended or appropriated. I warn you now that you will rue the day if you do not place a limitation on the expenditures that may be incurred under this authorization. We have always and without exception done it thus far in all legislation enacted in the President's program. I repeat, that in the most important legislation enacted during the special session, namely, the National Recovery Act, we limited the authorization. In that case the limitation was $3,300,000,000.

What I am proposing by this amendment to do is to prevent the establishment of precedent—one we will regret in the future and one that will rise to plague us.

The Committee on Naval Affairs should have held hearings and made the most careful estimate possible as to the limit of cost and brought that estimate to the House, and that estimate should have been placed in this bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. I appreciate what the gentleman is trying to accomplish.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the gentleman stated this morning he would support such an amendment.

Mr. BRITTEN. I agree with what the gentleman is trying to accomplish.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then, will the gentleman vote for this amendment?

Mr. BRITTEN. I think the amount of $470,000,000 is too high. It will give everybody in the Navy Department something to shoot at, and they will spend it all.

Mr. HASTINGS. Did the gentleman vote for the $380,000,000 limitation?

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, that was too low.

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; that was too low. The gentleman is hard to satisfy. I want to say to the Members of the House that if we do not place a limitation in this bill we will establish a dangerous precedent. Congress has never before passed an authorization bill that did not carry a limitation as to the amount that may be expended.

Remember that this amendment involves only one question, and that is whether we are going to throw aside precedent that has been established in Congress and enact this bill which provides no limitation of the amount that may be expended under it.

I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations a number of years. Without exception, when an item is considered, for which an appropriation is asked, we refer to the authorization and we are careful never to exceed it. If an amount is included in an appropriation bill in excess of the authorization it is subject to a point of order. This is the only way the taxpayers of the country may be protected.

I have repeatedly emphasized the fact that in all these legislative bills, without exception, there has been a limitation contained in the bill.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] in presenting the rule which was adopted for the consideration of this bill, assured the House that those appearing before the Rules Committee in support of this bill, estimated that the carrying out of the program would call for an expenditure of $380,000,000. For that reason, in the first amendment which I offered, I included the figures $380,000,000, and when that amendment was not favorably considered I added the additional amount of 25 percent and included in that amendment the sum of $475,000,000, which was the outside figure estimated for before the Bureau of the Budget or the Committee on Rules. Those in charge of the bill are not willing to accept any limitation whatever. What does that mean? It means simply that a very much larger expenditure will be required.

A few days ago we passed the Navy Department appropriation bill which carried the sum of $308,669,562. The statement has been made that there was allocated from Public Works to the Navy Department, out of the $3,300,000,000 appropriation, which was passed during the special session of Congress, the sum of $238,000,000.

Let me call your attention to the provision in section 2 of the bill H.R. 6604. The first part of the section provides for a program bringing the Navy up to full treaty strength. Then follows this significant proviso:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to replace, by vessels of modern design and construction, vessels in the Navy in the categories limited by the treaties signed at Washington, February 6, 1922, and at London, April 22, 1930, when their replacement is permitted by the said treaties.

I invite your attention to the last line of this proviso, which is as follows:

When their replacement is permitted by the said treaties.

This proviso means that during the life of the treaties, and without additional authorization, the President is authorized to replace vessels in the Navy authorized by the treaties without any restriction. This is a continuing authorization. As I said a few moments ago, the sky is the limit. In western parlance "we take the bridle off."

We not only authorize the building program outlined in section 2 of the bill, the cost of which the members of the committee will not venture an estimate, but throughout the life of the treaty, in the years to come, no additional authorization is necessary.

During my service in the House I insist that I have never seen a bill passed that is so wide open. If this bill is finally enacted, there is no need of a legislative Committee on Naval Affairs. Search all the other legislative bills, whether the authorization is for a small amount or runs into billions, and it will be found a limitation is always included as to the amount for which an appropriation may be made.

It is urged that the Committee on Appropriations will make a careful investigation as to the amount necessary. This same argument with equal force could be used in support of any other legislative proposal. Why place a limitation on any other bill if a limitation is not going to be placed in this one.

Let me repeat, in order to emphasize it, that when the people of this Nation were in dire distress and when the National Recovery Act was passed, it carried a limitation of $3,300,000,000.

The press reports that the President is about to submit another estimate to Congress for $950,000,000 to carry on the relief program. In the bills prepared under the direction of the President and submitted to Congress the President always follows the rule and causes to be inserted a limitation in the amount of money that may be authorized to be expended. This is not the President's bill. I do not mean to say he may not be in sympathy with the enlargement of the Navy, but what I do mean to say is that I do not believe he or the Bureau of the Budget would approve a wide-open bill which has no limitation in it and which is a continuing authorization for years to come.

This precedent is going to rise to embarrass Congress. Every time an authorization is brought before Congress the same argument will be made that it may be difficult to estimate the cost involved. Every annual appropriation bill enacted is for the following fiscal year, and the committees make the best estimates possible and submit them to Congress. If we take the bridle off and give unlimited authority either to contract for or expend money, we will establish a precedent that will lead to extravagance which will all but wreck the Treasury financially.

When we go home, we will be called upon to account for the legislation we enacted, and let me warn the Members of the House that they will find great difficulty in explaining to constituents why they voted for unlimited and continuing authorizations where the sky is the limit.

The question presented here is not whether we are for or against the naval program. The only question now is whether Congress favors an authorization bill from a legislative committee, which is a continuing one and which has no limitation as to the amount that may be appropriated or expended under it, and that may call for an expenditure of more than a billion dollars.

When those in charge of the bill refuse to make an estimate or decline to support an amendment limiting the amount that may be expended, or refuse to offer a substitute, there is the more reason why Members of the House should insist that some limitation, either the amount of $380,000,000 proposed in my first amendment, or this amount of $475,000,000, proposed in the pending amendment, or some other amount, be included in the bill. I cannot too frequently emphasize the danger of the precedent that is about to be established through the enactment of this bill, which is a continuing authorization through the entire life of the treaties and without a limitation.

In the future, when the Navy appropriation bill comes up for consideration, surprise amendments may be offered in the House, without any consideration by the committee, and will not be subject to a point of order because this bill is a continuing authorization.

Two good amendments have been adopted this afternoon, one requiring that alternate vessels be constructed in the Government navy yards, and another amendment providing that no Government contract shall be let except where the firm or corporation agrees to limit its net profit to 10 percent of the contract. I warn the Members, however, that these two beneficial amendments may be eliminated in the Senate, and that the House conferees may be unfriendly to them and may be quick to yield, which will result in their final elimination from the bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The House has just signified its opinion on this matter. It should be controlled by the Bureau of the Budget through the Appropriations Committee.

I ask the committee to vote this amendment down, because the $475,000,000 the gentleman now suggests does not include airplanes, and it is estimated that the airplanes will cost $95,000,000 over the period of time during which this program is being carried out. It is impossible to tell what this program is going to cost. Leave it to the President to submit later to the Committee on Appropriations. The gentleman is a member of that committee.

I ask you not to scuttle this bill by hamstringing it as the gentleman from Oklahoma is undertaking to do.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Georgia will modify his motion and move that debate close in 5 minutes, in order that the gentleman from Kansas may be heard. I do not know whether he will speak in favor of the amendment or against it, but I think he should be heard.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much impressed with the principle the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] has been advocating. I realize it is very difficult here on the floor for the Members of the House to arrive at the proper amount to be expended for the Navy, but the fact remains that, as well as keeping up the Navy, we are daily under the obligation of preserving parliamentary government under the Constitution.

Probably the most important responsibility placed upon the legislative body is the control over public expenditures. It was with this thought in mind that the provision was incorporated in the Constitution requiring that the expenditure of public money and the raising of public revenue originate in the House, the body frequently elected by the people.

Now, it is an exceedingly dangerous policy to turn over the Nation's check book, with checks signed in blank, to the executive branch of the Government. Not only is it contrary to parliamentary government in America, but it is contrary to parliamentary government in England and contrary to parliamentary government wherever that form of government has succeeded. It seems to me we should place some limitation on the amount to be expended. Then, if in the future it is necessary to spend more money, there will be a Congress which can meet that responsibility.

I shall vote to accept the last figure suggested by the gentleman from Oklahoma, not undertaking to say whether or not it represents the amount that should in the end be expended. I do undertake to say, however, that it represents all that need be expended until a future day when a future Congress can meet the responsibility of increasing the appropriation if necessary. In the meantime, as a matter of true constitutional, parliamentary government, we should retain in the hands of Congress some control over the amount of money which is to be expended for the Navy or any other purpose.

The real issue involved here is the precedent that we are establishing of turning over to the executive department the privilege of spending an unlimited amount. When I say that I am not talking about a Democratic executive department I am talking in the broader sense of government under the two branches—the legislative and the executive. The fathers of this country wisely reserved for the legislative branch the responsibility for appropriations. We should not now reverse their wisdom by shifting this responsibility from the Congress to the executive department.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Is it not true that if we pass the bill as it is written they still cannot expend any more than we may appropriate when the time comes; is that not true?

Mr. McGUGIN. Oh, yes; but unless we are going to make a farce out of authorizations, we should place some limit on them.

Mr. KELLER. If you can make your limitation complete before your Appropriations Committee, why should you place a limit on something you do not know enough about to limit at the present time?

Mr. TABER. The reason we should place a limitation is because if we do not the estimates submitted will always be way beyond any imagination that anybody has now.

Mr. McGUGIN. And the Membership of the House should not pass the buck as to that responsibility over to the Appropriations Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VINSON of Georgia) there were—ayes 92, nays 115.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. VINSON of Georgia and Mr. HASTINGS.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 74, nays 127.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TOBEY: Amend section 3 by striking out the period after the word "act", in line 2 on page 3, and adding thereafter the following:

"Provided, however, That no such appropriation shall be used for any contract with steel or aircraft or shipbuilding firms or corporations unless the said firm or corporation shall agree to limit its net profit on such Government contract to 10 percent of the gross of the contract."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman to withhold the point of order until I can make a statement?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It is getting late. The gentleman knows it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, from the reading of the amendment it did not appear to me to be germane. Of course, if it is germane, I would like to have the Chair rule and have it voted on one way or the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

This precedent I quote is from a decision by Chairman BEEDY on February 27, 1928:

An amendment specifying the manner in which a sum of money is to be expended is germane to a provision in the bill dealing with the authorization of the money.

The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Chairman, public opinion in these United States of ours has long been outraged over the revelations of inordinate profits that have accrued to the manufacturers of aircraft, ships of war, and munitions. Methods have been practiced that are not only unethical but are absolutely scandalous and are a black page on the history of this country and our Government.

The name is legion of men and women the country over, of all creeds and all parties, who have long hoped that the day might come when we might do something within our power, God helping us, to remove this menace of inordinate profits in the production of ships and munitions for war.

President Roosevelt, whose name has been mentioned frequently here today by the proponents of this bill, came out strongly in his campaign of 1932 in declaring as one of his policies the taking of profits out of war and munitions making.

Toward this worthy objective I offer this amendment here today.

Here is an opportunity, in my judgment, for the men and women of this House to demonstrate that they are in sympathy with the President in this great matter and an opportunity to point to the people of this country of ours and say, "So far as we are concerned, this inordinate profit making shall stop, and such contracts shall be awarded to the lowest bidder and only a reasonable profit, limited to 10 percent net on the gross amount of the contract, shall accrue." Here is a chance to show the country that we mean something more than idle talk with reference to restricting the great profits made in the manufacture of ships and munitions for war. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOBEY. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman's amendment prohibits a contractor from making more than 10 percent on such a contract; is that it?

Mr. TOBEY. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment again so that the gentleman may understand it.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman state whether I am correct in that or not?

Mr. TOBEY. I think the gentleman is not correct.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman state exactly what the amendment means?

Mr. TOBEY. It means that if this amendment is adopted, when the President orders bids to be made for aircraft, ships, or munitions of war, the lowest bidder, consistent with his character and reputation, and so on, naturally will get the contract. When he gets it, he can only get it by agreeing that the net profit on the gross amount of the contract shall be 10 percent and not over that.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The language limits the profits to 10 percent?

Mr. TOBEY. That is correct.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the hearings before the Appropriations Committee it was disclosed that some of the airplane corporations did not make more than 5 percent, and under the gentleman's amendment they would be assured a profit of 10 percent.

Mr. TOBEY. And I may tell the gentleman that we can find many instances in this country where the profit has been as much as 200 percent.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Let us get this straight, because we are all interested in what the gentleman is proposing. Does this amendment insure the shipbuilders a profit of at least 10 percent?

Mr. TOBEY. Oh, no, no; not over 10 percent.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The amendment says the shipbuilder cannot make over 10 percent.

Mr. TOBEY. Not over 10 percent.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. If he cannot make over 10 percent, then is the reverse true and does the amendment absolutely assure him a profit of 10 percent?

Mr. TOBEY. The gentleman is quibbling about points and differentials. I am for limiting the profits, and the gentleman ought to be for the amendment, as I have explained it fully. I think the Members are ready to vote upon it.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am trying to find out how the amendment would apply to a contract. Suppose the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. were to enter into a contract to construct one of these ships for $5,000,000, what effect would the gentleman's amendment have on the contract?

Mr. TOBEY. With a gross contract of $5,000,000 they could make 10 percent on that at the most.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOBEY. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. May I ask the chairman of the committee what airplane corporation only made 5 percent? When they issue their statements to their stockholders they never say they have made only 5 percent.

Mr. TOBEY. That is true, and I would say that 10 percent is a reasonable profit for anybody.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Of course, the gentleman's amendment has been offered here late in the evening, and no one wants the corporations who are to construct these ships to profiteer at the expense of the taxpayers. If the amendment seeks to hold down their profits, I am heartily in accord with the gentleman. I want to ascertain from the gentleman, however, this fact: If a contract is entered into for $5,000,000 for the building of one ship, does that mean that the corporation would have the right to make $500,000?

Mr. TOBEY. I do not understand it so; no, sir.

Let me say to the gentleman that these questions are taking up the time that the gentleman has been so careful about. Let us vote on this matter.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again read?

The Clerk again read the pending amendment.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That in the event of international agreement for the further limitations of naval armament to which the United States is signatory, the President is hereby authorized and empowered to suspend so much of its naval construction authorized by this act as may be necessary to bring the naval armament of the United States within the limitation so agreed upon.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 9, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a colon, and the words "except that such suspension shall not apply to vessels actually under construction."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the committee accepts that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 3 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, during the course of this debate this afternoon the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] read into the RECORD the names of a number of religious organizations having for their purpose the propagation of a spirit of peace in our country. He also read a statement of a number of religious organizations that financed these organizations.

I want it to appear that I question the accuracy of the statement by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I direct attention to the fact that this same gentleman 2 years ago questioned the motives of the President of the United States and asked for his impeachment. I also call attention to the fact that last year he questioned the motives of several high officials of the Government and asked for their impeachment.

The gentleman from Illinois also questioned the motives of the organizations and said something about asking for an investigation. I should like to vote for an investigation of these organizations provided that at the same time we shall investigate the propaganda of the various munition makers and shipbuilders in our country. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot do that in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McFADDEN. Then I will wait until we are in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee will rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLANTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 6604) to establish the composition of the United States Navy with respect to the categories of vessels limited by the treaties signed at Washington, February 6, 1922, and at London, April 26, 1930, at the limits prescribed by those treaties; to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels; and for other purposes, under rule 235 he reported the bill back to the House with various amendments adopted by the Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question of ordering the yeas and nays was taken, and 13 Members rose.

The SPEAKER. Thirteen Members have arisen—not a sufficient number.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. VINSON of Georgia, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think it valuable to consider briefly, at the outset of the discussion of this naval building program, what has been accomplished by this country, in cooperation with the other great naval powers, in the field of limitation of armament.

The program proposed here in no sense marks a deviation or departure from the principles laid down by this Government at the Naval Conference held in this city in 1921 and 1922 and reaffirmed at the Naval Conference held in London in 1930.

It can be said, I think, that the great naval powers have definitely determined that armament shall be limited, not only because naval races have become so expensive that economically the burden cannot be endured but because there is the firm belief, and one which I believe to be well founded, that excessive armament tends only to hasten war, with all its horror and waste. We are determined that this country shall not again be plunged into war if it can possibly be prevented.

There can be no denying the fact that the upkeep of navies and armies are expensive undertakings. On the other hand, without attempting to analyze the reasons, most of us feel that they are necessary and that they must be efficiently maintained.

There is, I believe, no greater incentive for war than great inequality in the armed strength of those nations which are daily in competition along the trade routes of the world. It was with this in mind that the Washington Conference was undertaken. It was conceded that armament was necessary. The question was to secure an agreement among the naval powers as to the amount and allocation.

We are engaged here in a building program looking to the establishment of a fleet such as was allowed us by virtue of the Washington and London Treaties. We desire no more, and we should be satisfied with no less.

In order that we may get a clear view of our present proposal, I should like to review briefly the naval situation at the time of the Washington Conference. At the time of the Conference we had built, or building, 520 ships of 2,062,528 tons, the greatest Navy every known. Great Britain had 422 ships of 1,813,802 tons; Japan, 166 ships of 853,111 tons; France, 121 ships of 449,240 tons; and Italy, 136 ships of 321,360 tons. I cite these five because they are the great naval powers.

That there may be no doubt as to the sincere desire of this country to promote to the utmost a plan looking to the limitation of all naval armament, let us look at the plan submitted to that Conference by our Government. The American plan rested upon the application of these four general principles:

First. That all capital-shipbuilding programs, either actual or projected, should be abandoned.

Second. That further reduction should be made through the scrapping of certain of the older ships.

Third. That, in general, regard should be had to the existing naval strength of the powers concerned.

Fourth. That the capital-ship tonnage should be used as the measurement of strength for navies and a proportionate allowance of auxiliary combatant craft prescribed.

Applying these principles: The United States was then completing its program of 1916 calling for 10 new battleships and 6 battle cruisers. One battleship had been completed. The others were in various stages of construction; in some cases from 60 to over 80 percent of the construction had been done. On the capital ships then being built, over $330,000,000 had been spent. The United States proposed, provided the other naval powers agreed to make comparable sacrifices, to—

First. Scrap all capital ships then under construction. This included 6 battle cruisers and 7 battleships on the ways and in the course of building, and 2 battleships launched. The total number of new capital ships thus to be scrapped was 15. The total tonnage of these ships completed would have been 618,000 tons. Now we have 15 of 455,400 tons.

Second. Scrap all older battleships up to, but not including, the Delaware and North Dakota. The number to be scrapped being 15, with a total tonnage of 227,740 tons.

Thus the total number of capital ships proposed by us to be scrapped amounted to 30, with an aggregate tonnage—including that of ships in construction, if completed—of 845,740 tons.

These proposed reductions, as I have stated above, were predicated upon like reductions, or rather reductions in proportion by the other powers.

It cannot be denied that this program is conclusive evidence that this country intended to limit armament and to limit it at once.

With comparatively few changes the plan became part of the treaty subsequently adhered to by the naval powers. It was provided, on account of the inability of the Japanese Government to agree to the scrapping of the Mutsu, for reasons which need not be gone into here, that the two ships of the West Virginia class then under construction, might be completed by the United States and upon their completion the North Dakota and the Delaware were to be scrapped. Great Britain was permitted to build two new ships upon condition that four of the older ships which otherwise were to have been retained, would be scrapped upon their completion.

Not only did the Washington Conference provide for the scrapping of a tremendous amount of tonnage by the great naval powers, but it went further and provided for definite limitation as to the navies to be maintained in the future.

The proposal of the United States was that the United States, England, and Japan scrap 66 capital fighting ships built and building with a total tonnage of 1,878,043 tons. The only major changes made in arriving at the final agreement were those involving the Mutsu referred to above.

This reduction in armament is particularly impressive when we remember that these same powers also agreed that there were to be retained 50 capital ships, aggregating 1,382,420 tons, less by approximately 500,000 tons than that disposed of. Of course, some of the ships scrapped were still building and in our estimate of tonnage we have regarded them as completed ships.

Great Britain retained 22 capital ships, the United States 18 and Japan 10. France retained 10 of 221,770 tons and Italy 10 of 182,800 tons.

There were certain provisions dealing with fortifications in the Pacific and other matters concerning warfare which I shall not attempt to discuss here.

It was agreed that the first replacement tonnage should not be laid down until 10 years from the date of the agreement, but that, subject to the 10-year limitation, capital ships might be replaced when they were 20 years old.

It was also provided that no capital ships should be built in replacement with a tonnage of more than 35,000 tons. The maximum limits of capital tonnage are as follows:

United States	525,000
Great Britain	525,000
Japan	315,000
France	175,000
Italy	175,000

It should be remembered that these figures represent only capital tonnage. The original American plan provided that the auxiliary combatant craft allowed each power should be in proportion to this tonnage. Upon this basis the tonnage of cruisers, flotilla leaders, and destroyers proposed for the three large naval powers was:

United States	450,000
Japan	270,000

The total tonnage of submarines proposed was:

United States	90,000

It is interesting to note here that the British delegation proposed the absolute abolition of all submarines. This proposal was rejected for a plan proposing the limitation of the use of this vessel. The proposal in reference to auxiliaries would have left France and Italy each with 150,000 tons of cruisers, flotilla leaders, and destroyers and a maximum for submarines of 30,000 tons each. France, in accepting the allowance for capital ships, had made a distinct reservation in reference to the other categories. She maintained that her necessities required that she be allowed 330,000 tons for cruisers, and so forth, and 90,000 tons for submarines.

Such being the case, no agreement was possible insofar as auxiliary craft and submarines were concerned.

An agreement was reached in reference to aircraft carriers, which were at that time decidedly experimental. The following limits were agreed upon:

	Tons
United States	135,000
Great Britain	135,000
France	60,000

On account of the experimental nature of these vessels, provision was made for replacement without regard to age. The maximum tonnage of each carrier was set at 27,000 tons, with the exception that the signatories might build not more than two carriers, each of a tonnage not to exceed 33,000 tons.

In order to effect economy any of the powers were allowed to use for the construction of carriers any two of their ships either built or building, which otherwise would be scrapped under the treaty. This provision permitted the United States to construct the Saratoga and Lexington. The carrier was defined as a vessel in excess of 10,000 tons designed for the specific and exclusive purpose of carrying aircraft, and so constructed that airplanes might be launched therefrom and land thereon. The following provision is made as to guns. If it carried guns exceeding 6 inches the total number of guns should not exceed 10. It could not carry a gun in excess of 8 inches. There is no limit on 5-inch and antiaircraft guns. In case of the 33,000 tonners, it was provided that in case any of its guns exceeded 6 inches, excepting antiaircraft and guns not over 5 inches, not more than 8 could be carried.

Thus, we see that the Washington Conference brought about definite limitations as to capital ships and aircraft carriers and provided for disarmament on a scale heretofore unknown.

We now come to the London Conference of 1930. This conference was called as a result of conversations arising out of the Paris Peace Pact of 1928 between the United States and Great Britain. These conversations were made known as they proceeded to the other nations which had taken part in the Washington Conference.

The conference was called for the avowed purpose of continuing the work started by the Washington Conference and of agreeing to a parity of fleets category by category. This was necessary. While the Washington Conference had stopped competition in battleships it had merely transferred the competition to these other categories that were unlimited. Unless this could be effectively dealt with we were to be faced with another great race in naval armament at a time when the economic collapse was becoming world-wide. This condition, I think, materially assisted the Nation in arriving at a definite conclusion.

The London Conference resulted in the definite limitation of tonnage of cruisers, submarines, and destroyers. I shall discuss this agreement more particularly as it applies to the United States, Great Britain, and Japan.

It was agreed that the provision of the Washington treaty dealing with capital ships was to be continued until December 31, 1936. No capital ships were to be laid down for replacement purposes during this period. In addition, provision was made for the scrapping of 3 capital ships by the United States, 5 by Great Britain, and 1 by Japan. Thus we see a determined effort on the part of all the agreeing powers to continue the limitation in reference to the largest naval vessels.

There was a change in the definition of aircraft carriers. It was provided that the expression "aircraft carrier" was to include any surface vessel of war, whatever its displacement, designed for the specific and exclusive purpose of carrying aircraft and so constructed that aircraft could be launched therefrom and landed thereon. It was provided further that no capital ship in existence on April 1, 1930, should be fitted with a landing-on platform or deck.

But probably more important than anything else was the limitations arrived at in reference to cruisers, destroyers, and submarines. It will be remembered that these are the catagories upon which agreement was impossible at the Washington Conference. The cruiser category was divided into two subcategories, (a) and (b), as follows:

(a) Cruisers carrying a gun above 6.1-inch caliber.

Destroyers were limited to not over 5.1 guns and a tonnage not to exceed 1,850, with the further provision, however, that not more than 16 percent of the allowed total tonnage should be employed in vessels of over 1,500 tons.

Submarines were restricted to 2,000 tons with not above 5.1 guns. With the exception that each of the contracting powers were allowed to retain, build, or acquire a maximum of three submarines of not above 2,800 tons with guns not above 6.1-inch caliber, and within this number France was allowed to retain one unit, already launched, of 2,880 tons mounting 8-inch guns.

The treaty provided, as to cruisers, that on December 31, 1936, the tonnage should not exceed—

United States, 323,500 tons; (a) 180,000 tons; (b) 143,500 tons.

Japan, 208,950 tons; (a) 108,400 tons; (b) 100,450 tons.

DESTROYERS

United States, 150,000 tons; Great Britain, 150,000 tons; Japan, 105,500 tons.

SUBMARINES

United States, 52,700 tons; Great Britain, 52,700 tons; Japan, 52,700 tons.

It was provided that the maximum number of subcategory (a), or 8-inch cruisers, should be:

United States, 18; British Commonwealth of Nations, 15; Japan, 12.

I have trespassed on your time with this rather detailed statement of the results of our two naval conferences in order to show you that this bill which we are considering today in no sense marks the beginning of a naval race; it in no sense marks a departure from our preconceived plan of limiting naval armament. It merely enables us to bring our naval force to the strength allowed us by treaty. This should be done. No nation should be allowed to become greatly superior to the others on account of the failure of the others to maintain their forces at treaty strength. I hold no brief for heavy armament. I believe that the race in arming ends in war, but I am convinced that the same end is accomplished when there is great disparity of armament. It is the duty of this Government, as it is the duty of the other contracting parties, to either maintain their forces as provided in the treaty or to ask that the terms of the treaty be revamped.

Now, leaving aside the situation existing in the other nations—I have no quarrel with them if they insist upon building ships within the limits provided in the treaty—what is the situation facing us?

First. We need not consider capital ships, because building in this category is definitely ended until December 31, 1936, at least.

Second. Of aircraft carriers we are allowed 135,000 tons; we now have under-age 2 carriers of 66,000 tons; 3, aggregating 53,800 tons, are building and appropriated for. This leaves us 15,200 of unused tonnage. We are asking that one additional carrier be built in order that we may have our total treaty tonnage.

Third. What about our destroyers? We have at present 251, totaling 267,470 tons. This would seem to be more than allowed. But 248 of them, totaling 263,900 tons, are over-age. This leaves us with three under-age destroyers, and these will be over-age as this program gets under way. We have building and appropriated for 32, totaling 50,800 tons. We are asking that 65 be built, aggregating 99,200 tons. These will bring us up to treaty strength in this category.

Fourth. We are allowed 52,700 tons of submarines. We now have 82, totaling 67,790 tons, but 37 aggregating 21,260 tons, are over-age. There are building and appropriated for 6, of 7,460 tons. The treaty allows us to lay down before December 31, 1936, 30 more, totaling 35,530 tons, in order to bring this category to treaty limit. We are asking that this be done.

It must be remembered that this building program is to extend over a period of 5 years, at a cost of approximately $90,000,000 per year. This, I know, is a tremendous sum of money. Yet we must bear in mind that we are dealing here with the first line of defense of the Nation, if you will pardon an overworked expression. The total amounts to, roughly, 70 cents per person in the United States. Surely that cannot be regarded as excessive.

Mr. FOULKES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose this bill. In my judgment there are but few Members of this House who have familiarized themselves enough with its terms to cast an intelligent vote in its support. It is extremely difficult for the Members to follow the debate into terms of battleships, cruisers, and other war paraphernalia, but not so difficult to follow it in terms of sums of money appropriated.

A recent naval appropriation bill amounting to $293,000,000 passed this House. Many of the Members who voted for that bill were laboring under the impression that no further appropriations would be asked. That one sum alone is more than double what our Navy has cost us, in peace or war, in any one year before 1917.

We are now told that the Public Works Administration has added $276,000,000 and we are now beseeched to give an additional $470,000,000, making a total of $1,039,000,000 to be appropriated and allotted for Navy purposes. In my humble judgment such terrific sums of money for destructive purposes is a crime and a serious reflection upon the honesty and intelligence of the American people. We are spending each year more money on our Navy than any nation has spent in peace time in all history. In the past 3 years we have spent $60,000,000 more on our Navy than the combined navies of France, Italy, and Japan, and twice the sum that Great Britain has spent on her navy. The proponents of this bill lay special emphasis on the facts that these immense appropriations are necessary for preparedness. I am curious to learn what national power we should be prepared against. Certainly, the most zealous jingoist would not have the temerity to intimate that Great Britain was a danger to us. Then if this be true it must be against Japan, for she is the only other nation possessing a navy in any degree comparable to ours.

Let us analyze this situation for a moment and search for the TRUTH. Japan's entire appropriation for navy purposes during the 3 years last passed amounted only to $381,000,000. During this same period we have appropriated more than $4,000,000,000 for our own. Certainly, there can be no immediate danger from that quarter. A consolidation of forces with France, Italy, and Japan against our own is unthinkable, and even if such a calamity should occur we still have the preponderance of power. Can the supporters of this bill give any reasonable excuse why the stupendous outlays on the American Navy has brought about the meager results and unpreparedness which they now claim while other nations have supposedly built alleged efficient navies at such an amazingly less cost? We are given to understand that our administration has been attempting to set an example of disarmament to the rest of the world, and now we are asked to appropriate more money for destructive purposes than the other three great naval powers on earth.

If we are still inadequately prepared, as the Navy crowd state, then what has become of these $4,000,000,000 wrung from the taxpayers of this country, and what assurance have we that the billion and a quarter now demanded will produce more beneficial results. If we are still unprepared, it certainly cannot be for lack of liberal appropriations; and does any Member imagine that even the staggering sums now demanded will satisfy the Navy clique. A year or two hence they will again be knocking at the Treasury door with the same old excuse and war bugaboo, which I am quite convinced they themselves do not believe.

Mr. Speaker, I have sat through the debate on this bill patiently waiting to hear some voice raised in behalf of peace. I had hoped that somewhere in this distinguished body of gentlemen a voice from out of the wilderness could be heard translating these tremendous sums of money into terms of useful things. Do you know that ignorance is rampant in our land; that young men and women are unable to secure the educational advantages that would fit them for good citizenship. This one appropriation alone would endow 2,078 colleges with $500,000 each to carry on this most-desired and benevolent work? Did you know that the more than $4,000,000,000 appropriated for destruction of human life within the past few years would redeem every farm mortgage within the United States, thereby leaving the sorely distressed agriculturist the master of his own home and securing the destiny of his children? Did you know that this one appropriation alone now being demanded would build an 18-foot concrete road at the cost of $20,000 a mile for a distance of 52,000 miles, equal to 16 paid highways across the American Continent from New York City to San Francisco, and that literally hundreds of hospitals, now so badly needed, could be endowed for a mere fraction of this amount.

Since the Washington Conference, so blatantly heralded as a peace movement, more than nine thousand millions of dollars have been spent on our Army and Navy, and still they tell us we are not prepared for war. Let me ask again, War against what power?

It is not by accident that the trust press of the country at this particular time are exploiting many articles referring to our course as a "policy of disarmament by example", which they appear to fear may be a menace to world peace. I notice that these bought and paid-for newspapers are all pursuing the same objective now, and it will be interesting to note their lack of interest in our national-defense policy once this bill passes this body.

Mr. Speaker, if we should drain the National Treasury of every dollar and exhaust the entire credit of the American people in Army and Navy expenditures, it still would not satisfy these junkers who, like the privileged Bourbons of France, forgot nothing and learned nothing new. All history teaches the lesson in flaming words that huge military establishments lead to national ruin and that the paths of military glory lead but to the grave. Can we not profit by the past mistakes of other nations built upon the shifting sands of militarism?

Where are now our German friends with their pompous salutes and their ridiculous goose step? Their people are ruined and the most high is in exile and disgrace.

Mr. Speaker, this is a Christian Nation. The vast majority of our people believe in the divine tenets of their faith. While I have been somewhat neglectful of my Christian duties, I nevertheless have a deep and abiding respect for the millions of good men and women who make up these Christian congregations and without whose support the war junkers would have this Nation in the clutches of the military caste which would soon plunge us into the inevitable destiny of all such nations.

Mr. Speaker, in the special session of this Congress our Members saw fit to support the economy bill. While I was not one who voted for the bill, due to my absence on Agriculture Committee business, it is not for me to question their motives or integrity in so doing. It is quite probable that I should have done likewise, as I have supported our President in his program. Today the harmful results of this legislation are apparent in every section of our country. The thought occurs to me that instead of appropriating more money for the destruction of life and happiness and for the purpose of still promoting war, if it would not be more in keeping with the Christian doctrines of He who said, "Forgive them; they know not what they do." Why not divert a substantial part of these war appropriations to heal the wounds of those who suffered by the last GREAT MISTAKE? I do not wish to indulge in personalities nor engage in unfair criticism of any Government department. You gentlemen who have had occasion to contact either the War or Navy arms of our Government have doubtless formed opinions similar to my own regarding these great expenditures. There can be no doubt but that strongly organized propaganda is deliberately carried on for the purpose of frightening the citizens into demanding these large appropriations on the pretense that we are surrounded by enemies, whose principal object in life is to destroy us. Much of this propaganda is deliberate falsehood. It is unpatriotic and a mere bugaboo for the exploitation of our people. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bill for the reasons given. It is a deliberate waste of money that should be directed into other channels where it is so badly needed in behalf of a distressed people.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, right now when we are passing judgment on the advisability of a greater Navy I believe that a brief résumé of the history of naval aviation since its inception in the Navy is conducive to the understanding of how naval aviation has grown from an arm of doubtful value—to all but a few enthusiastic and far-seeing supporters—into its position of today as an integral part of the fleet.

The first naval officers were detailed for flight instruction in the early part of 1911, after a 3-year investigation of this new art by the Navy Department. One naval officer had been given flight training the previous year following a demonstration by Eugene Ely that an airplane could be flown from a platform on a vessel. This was accomplished on November 4, 1910, aboard the U.S.S. Birmingham at Hampton Roads, Va. On January 18, 1911, Mr. Ely made a successful landing on a platform built aboard the U.S.S. Pennsylvania and the following day he flew his plane off the platform on which he had landed. This was the forerunner of the aircraft carrier.

The naval aviation unit operated at Annapolis, Md., from the summer of 1911 until the winter of 1913, at which time the detachment went to Guantanamo, Cuba, and operated with the fleet during its target practices and maneuvers. Here it was learned how much better the officers in the airplanes could spot the fall of shot and how valuable the airplane was for scouting purposes.

In 1914 a naval air station was established on the old navy yard site at Pensacola, Fla., and regular classes of officers were assigned for flight training twice a year. It was during this year that naval aviation was first employed in a national emergency at Vera Cruz, Mexico.

During the following 3 years there occurred a temporary set-back due to the U.S.S. North Carolina, the aviation ship at Pensacola, being sent to Europe with its complement of aviation officers and men.

The World War gave aviation a tremendous impetus, including naval aviation. After the war there was the natural diminishing of activities and naval aviation progressed more slowly but steadily until 1926, when Congress authorized the 5-year aircraft-building program, upon the completion of which the naval aviation organization had reached a force of 1,000 useful planes as a limiting number.

It is perfectly evident to a person who thinks that the Navy must have aviation. It must have it to use against enemy ships and against enemy aircraft to get information concerning the enemy fleet, so that this information may be used by the commander in chief, who is manipulating his fleet of various types of ships to his best advantage.

The Navy would first use airplanes for the purpose of obtaining information—that is, scouting. Scouting is the search for the location of the enemy fleet; it is carried out by submarines, destroyers, cruisers, and aircraft. Aircraft are particularly valuable on account of their superior speed, which allows them to search areas in advance of their fleet during daylight hours, which areas the fleet will be passing through during the coming night.

If the enemy be sighted, the aviator must be able to form an estimate of the situation. He must be able to determine the types of ships, their formation, their course, their speed, and their probable intentions. This information he must be able to signal back to his commander in chief in secret codes and he must continue to follow up this information in order to further develop the situation. He may even have to fight his way through hostile aircraft in order to determine the exact intention of the enemy or to report any change in disposition of the enemy fleet. Only an aviator who has spent his entire service life in the Navy and practiced such work in peace times can have the thorough knowledge necessary to do it efficiently.

Upon receipt of this information the commander in chief makes the disposition of his own fleet to meet the enemy under conditions most advantageous to himself. He places his submarines, cruisers, battleships, and aircraft in the position desired and proceeds into action. He may decide to use his aircraft carrier force, including bombing, torpedo, and fighting planes, in order to destroy the enemy carriers before coming within gun range. The pilots of these planes must be able to recognize the enemy ships as to size and type, and they must be so indoctrinated that even though they have to pass directly over choice targets of other type ships to get to their assigned objective they do so because they realize that a carefully formulated plan might go astray if they fail to do their designated task. When they reach the enemy carriers they must bring into play the skill evolved from long months or years of practice in the art of dropping a bomb from a fast-moving airplane down through varying winds to hit a moving target.

As the two fleets close to within gun range, the observation planes are launched from the catapults, with which all cruisers and battleships are equipped. They take their proper positions and gaze down on the enemy fleet as though it were a set of toys moving around below them. The large guns of today are capable of carrying a projectile to a target which is invisible to the firing ship, due to the earth's curvature. To the observer in the airplane, however, the enemy ship is clearly visible from his elevated position, and he radios the bearing to his ship. When firing commences, the air observer tells his ship by radio whether the shell splashes, are over, or short, right or left, and coaches the gunners onto the target. This, of course, sounds quite simple in the individual case, but think what it must be when not one but a dozen ships are firing at a closely grouped column of enemy ships—when splashes are visible everywhere—then is the time that his previous training in this type of work begins to bear fruit. Due to his knowledge of the art of naval warfare and to his constant practice for this very event, he is able to keep track of his own ship's splashes and radio back the required information for attaining the greatest number of hits per gun per minute.

From the time that contact with the enemy is reported by the scouting planes until the end of the engagement, the fighting planes will be constantly engaged with the enemy in warding off their attacks and denying them information, protecting our own torpedo, bombing, and observation planes; or, in other words, maintaining control of the air. The pilots of these fighting planes must also be governed by the same school of thought and action, and must have the same sea understanding as the pilots of the other types of planes and those officers who are engaged in operating the vessels on and under the surface of the sea, all under the direct orders of the commander in chief.

The patrol plane, our one remaining type, operates from a land base but may shift this land base to various points, assisted by tenders, or mother ships. The patrol-type plane is a huge seaplane used for scouting purposes over large areas of the sea not in the immediate vicinity of the fleet. These planes carry large quantities of fuel and are well equipped with radio, so that they may remain in the air for long periods of time and by radio advise the commander in chief of the presence or absence of the enemy within certain limits. Flying as they do, hundreds of miles at sea, the pilots must necessarily be well versed in the art of navigation; they must be familiar with all types of surface ships and must be acquainted with naval radio codes and procedure as well as with recognition signals. In addition to patrol work, these planes are capable of carrying heavy loads of bombs for long distances.

It becomes quite apparent then that naval aviation's functions parallel those of all other combatant naval craft: It scouts as does the cruiser, but has a greater area of visibility; it spots the fall of shot as does the shipboard spotter, but from a more advantageous position; it launches torpedoes as does a destroyer, but with a swifter attack; it drops bombs as the gun of the battleship hurtles an explosive projectile on an enemy.

The Navy is the front line of defense, and naval aviation is the advance guard of this first line. As long as the fleet is maintained and as long as naval aviation is properly maintained as a part of the balanced fleet we need have no fears for our safety.

The aviation organization of the United States Navy is manned entirely by officers and enlisted men drawn from the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Regular Navy. An efficient naval aviator must have a thorough knowledge of the Navy, its doctrine, its traditions, and customs. The ability to fly, no matter how excellent that ability may be, is in itself insufficient. A naval aviator thoroughly indoctrinated is thus able to fully discharge his duties even in the absence of explicit directions.

Naval aviation is known as "the eyes of the fleet" and is to the fleet as integral a part as are the eyes to a body.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill amounts to nothing more than a declaration of a naval policy on the part of the United States Government, a policy that our country has been without for some time.

If the naval program provided for in this bill is carried out over a 5-year period, the output of naval craft resulting therefrom will be simply for replacing naval units already in existence. In other words, this bill provides for the carrying out of a naval replacement program which will keep our Navy to treaty limits by replacing over-aged naval units.

The active age of battleships and other fighting craft are fixed by naval treaties. Battleships and cruisers are supposed to be scrapped after 20 years, destroyers after 16 years, and submarines after 15 years. Navies at the present time are estimated by tonnage and not by the number of naval craft. On December 31, 1933, our Navy had 372 ships, aggregating 1,038,660 tons, but of this number, 288 ships, representing 330,110 tons, were over-aged, leaving the United States Navy on December 31, 1933, with 84 ships under-age, with a tonnage of 708,550. These over-aged naval craft are out of date and are of no great value to a navy, except from the numerical standpoint in times of peace, so the United States on December 31, 1933, had a Navy of 84 up-to-date, and effective sea-going craft.

When the World War closed, the United States had the greatest Navy afloat, either built or building. At the Washington Conference in 1922 our Government, speaking through Secretary of State Hughes, offered to scrap 11 of the greatest fighting battleships ever constructed, and 20 other battleships, as an example to the world of our desire to bring about world naval disarmament. These 31 battleships, that our country unselfishly offered to scrap and did scrap, represented over 800,000 tons of warcraft that had cost about $300,000,000 to build, brought our Navy down to a tonnage basis of about 1,186,000 tons. We not only scrapped these ships in order to set a fine example for international naval reduction, but we also spent about $20,000,000 in cutting them up into scrap iron so they could be disposed of in the trade.

Our unselfish act was enthusiastically applauded by the representatives of the great nations of the world who were assembled in that famous Washington Conference in 1922. But applause was all that followed from our actions in scrapping naval units that gave our country mastery of the seas. All the other large countries except Germany, which was prohibited under the Treaty of Paris from engaging in naval building at all, started out on a naval building program the likes of which they had never followed before. The Washington Conference resulted in two accomplishments: First, the scrapping of 800,000 tons of our Navy; and, secondly, a treaty between United States, Great Britain, and Japan to limit these countries to the number of battleships, called "capital ships", they had at that time. It was not possible to get any agreement at that conference limiting the building of other warcraft.

From 1922 to 1926 the United States had no naval building program. It simply beat time, so to speak, waiting for the rest of the world to follow its example in cutting down their navies.

In 1926 our country ordered the construction of 16 battle cruisers as a kind of a start of a navy program.

In 1927 the Second International Navy Disarmament Conference assembled at Geneva. At this conference the representatives of the United States pleaded in vain for a further limitation upon naval building programs, but our pleas fell upon deaf ears, largely because of the fact that since the Washington Conference our country had done practically nothing in the way of keeping up any kind of a naval construction program except the start made in 1926 in the authorization of 16 new battle cruisers which had yet to be built.

In 1930 another naval conference was called at London, in an endeavor to reduce the naval building program of the world—and by the world is meant outside the United States, which had no naval building program. This conference made some progress toward naval limitations by the signing of the treaty which limited the maximum size of the navies of United States, Great Britain, and Japan as follows: United States, 1,186,200 tons; Great Britain, 1,201,700 tons; and Japan, 706,050 tons. This treaty largely affected navy crafts below battleships. Under the Washington treaty battleships had been limited as follows: United States, 15; Great Britain, 15; and Japan, 9. This limitation of battleships represents the famous ratio of 5–5–3. However, Japan was given the right to have as many submarines as either United States or Great Britain.

The London Treaty expires in 1936, and under its terms the three signing powers—United States, Great Britain, and Japan—agreed to scrap all units of their navies that would give them tonnage in excess of the treaty limits referred to.

All these navy conferences have been attended by representatives of the United States, France, Italy, Great Britain, and Japan; but for some reason or other, while France and Italy were willing to talk world naval problems, they never signed any treaties pertaining to reduction of naval building.

Now, here we are, almost 4 years after the London Conference—what is the situation? In addition to ships now built and for which appropriations to build have been made up to December 31, 1936, the United States would have to construct 102 ships, as provided for in this bill, before 1936, in order to reach the London treaty limits, Great Britain 61 ships, and Japan no ships. Japan has already built up to the treaty limit.

Our country has today 54 ships being built or authorized, which means that we are now 156 below the London maximum treaty limit permissible for our Navy, considered from the standpoint of a navy ready for action.

Since the Washington Conference in 1922, or practically since the close of the World War, our country has only constructed 20 naval vessels, and it is a safe statement to make that England, Japan, France, and Italy have constructed five times that many naval vessels, with the result that today our Navy ranks only fifth as compared to other navies of the world. From the position of the first naval power in the world, we have fallen to fifth place, while the other large nations of the earth have speeded up their naval building program.

Mr. Speaker, our country has learned that our efforts to bring the world to a rational and sensible navy-building program has been a failure.

As I have said, this bill will not add a single vessel to our Navy. The naval construction herein provided for will go for replacement. If the full terms of this bill are carried out, it will take 4 or 5 years to complete the program, at least, and about $90,000,000 a year above our ordinary annual naval appropriations. When the program is completed, we will have about the same tonnage as today, but still below our treaty limit—with fewer vessels, because the size and tonnage of smaller units of navy warfare are being increased.

It would appear that the day of the big battleship, of about 40,000 tons and costing about $40,000,000 for each battleship, is over and that the world navies of the future will be made up largely of swift cruisers, submarines, submarine destroyers, and aircraft carriers.

It has been stated on the floor of this House that the United States Government has spent $4,000,000,000 on its Navy since 1922, more money than England and Japan have spent on their navies. This statement may be true, and probably is true, but we must remember that it costs a lot more money to build and operate our Navy than the navies of England and Japan because of the cost of material and higher wages in our country. The personnel of our battleships costs more than that of England or Japan because of the higher standard of living in our country.

Our representatives attended three naval conferences since the World War, and at each conference they were like lost sheep because they represented a country that had no definite naval building program. They represented a country that had made a tremendous sacrifice to lead the world on the pathway toward the goal of naval disarmament, but the world had not seen fit to follow its leadership.

If this bill passes and becomes a law, at the next naval conference our representatives will have a definite naval program as their guide, and for the first time our views will be potent and powerful in such a conference. Our representatives can then say to the representatives of the other great powers that the United States is opposed to the building of larger navies; but if the other nations of the world are set upon a mad naval building program, the United States will reluctantly comply with such a plan; but, on the other hand, we shall be willing to scrap more of our Navy if necessary, and to cut down our building program, if the rest of the world is willing and ready to follow us.

By passing the pending measure this House does not irrevocably commit itself to a navy-armament race. The President of the United States may not see fit to call upon Congress to make appropriations to fulfill the requirements of the Navy building program provided by this bill; and then, again, Congress still holds the purse strings. Contracts to build battleships or any other naval units are not made until Congress makes the appropriation.

The Navy building program provided for in this bill, looking into the future 5 or 6 years, can be changed at the next session of Congress or any succeeding sessions and also can be slowed down or speeded up by the President of the United States, as in the views of Congress and the President such changes may best serve our country's stand on naval armaments.

Since the announcement to the world that the United States would provide funds to build its Navy up to treaty limits, there has been a most favorable reaction in line with our views for the establishment of a lower maximum naval tonnage to which nations may build.

Mr. Speaker, there is another reason why I am for this bill. We are spending today hundreds of millions of dollars to put men to work. Much of this money is being spent on work that will have no lasting benefit to our country. It would seem that if ever there was a time when money could be spent on battleships and naval armaments—which may prove useless and unnecessary—this is the hour. Money spent in building up our Navy will give employment to millions, directly and indirectly, just the same as any other expenditure in building public structures and roads, and my judgment is that we will not only be able to put men to work, but we will also put our country in a position where the voice of the United States will have more power in arguing the cause of naval disarmament in world conferences.

Mr. Speaker, I am not for war; neither am I a pacifist. I think the proper course for our country to pursue is to do everything possible within its power to bring about a reduction in the armies and the navies of the world, but at the same time not to forget that the best peacemaker, as far as world peace is concerned, is the country that is prepared to protect its territory and its citizens on land and sea.

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 246

Roosevelt, upon his fifty-second birthday, with assurance of appreciation for his aggressive action and service to our country, and joins the Nation in best wishes for continued health, happiness, and accomplishments.

[Applause.]

The resolution was agreed to.

GENERAL LEAVE TO PRINT

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their own remarks upon the Navy bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LABOR RECORD OF CONGRESSMAN GEORGE HUDDLESTON

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, labor has many friends in Congress, but it is certain that few, if any, have a record equal to that of Congressman HUDDLESTON. During all his long service he has been the loyal and consistent friend of the men who work for wages. Through thick and thin, no matter how unpopular his position might have been, he has stood like a rock in defense of labor and of labor's right to organize and to follow policies for its own protection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON's services for labor have been innumerable. It would be impossible to recount them all so as to do him justice. Many of the issues on which he stood with labor are no longer acute. In glancing through the RECORD, however, it is not hard to find many instances in which he stood as labor's unfaltering friend. He has been no mere voting friend, nor has he merely followed leadership. On many occasions he has taken positions on labor's behalf without having been asked to do so.

CHALLENGED PRESIDENT HARDING

He has not merely been a voting friend, but many times, both in and out of Congress, has he challenged, with surpassing vigor and eloquence, those who had attacked the workingman. Perhaps the most notable instance of this kind was on August 18, 1922, when President Harding, having called Congress in special session, delivered a message upon the great coal and railroad strikes, which were then at their peak. Public opinion had been lashed into a fury against the strikers, and the President's address was scathing in criticizing them. As soon as he could get the floor thereafter, Mr. HUDDLESTON spoke to the House in answer to the President. He challenged Mr. Harding, both on his statements of fact and upon the principles announced. His speech, said by labor's friends to have been one of the strongest Mr. HUDDLESTON ever made, created a sensation, both in the House and over the country. Labor's representatives circulated many thousands of copies of the speech among the striking workers, who found it a great comfort in their sufferings. It was at this time that Mr. HUDDLESTON was dubbed by the newspaper Labor as "the little giant of the South", a name which has clung to him.

LABOR MEASURES INTRODUCED BY MR. HUDDLESTON

December 13, 1917: A bill to increase the pay of Federal employees. The employees were then very poorly paid and were suffering greatly owing to the fact that the cost of living had risen rapidly, while their pay remained on a 1906 basis.

July 11 and 19, 1919: Bills to encourage the production of coal. Upon release of war control, the operators had boosted prices to an excessive basis, resulting in a consumers' strike, so that the miners were in great distress for lack of work. Mr. HUDDLESTON proposed to reduce coal prices to the war basis so that the mines could resume.

August 1, 1919: A bill to create a commission to prevent profiteering in the necessities of life. Owing to release of war control, the cost of living had been boosted to the skies, and there was great suffering. Mr. HUDDLESTON proposed that the profits on the necessaries of life should be limited.

August 15, 1919: Resolution to investigate overcapitalization and watered stock in railroads. The fight was then on, which led to the adoption of the labor sections of the Transportation Act, 1920. Mr. Plumb, representing railroad labor organizations, asked that this resolution be offered as a defensive stroke against the efforts of the railroads to reduce wages below a decent living basis. Mr. Plumb, speaking in Capitol Park, Birmingham, some years later, just before his death, praising Mr. HUDDLESTON's courage, said, "He would fight a rattlesnake and give the snake the first bite."

THE ALABAMA COAL STRIKE

April 29, 1921: To use War Department supplies for the relief of the destitute striking coal miners in Alabama. The strike had been lost—the union was disrupted—the operators refused to employ those who had been active strikers, so that thousands of good miners and their families were destitute. Mr. HUDDLESTON's purpose was to provide food and clothing for these suffering people. In addition to defending the striking coal miners in Congress, Mr. HUDDLESTON spoke to the strikers in Capitol Park, at Pratt City, and other places. Blood had been shed, and feeling was high and bitter. While he counseled observance of peace, law, and order, his speeches explained their cause to outsiders and encouraged the strikers to stand firm. He has never advised a strike, but has always advocated peace; yet when strikes came, he did not hesitate to show his colors, while others, who now pretend to be friends of labor, were hiding their heads.

February 13, 1926: A bill to require the labeling of prison-made goods and products of child labor. This bill required that all such goods offered for sale should be labeled conspicuously, so that the purchaser would know that he was using an article made by convicts or by children, as the case might be. His agitation on this subject laid the foundation for the Cooper prison-goods bill, subsequently offered, and which is now the law.

BILL TO REGULATE MOTOR CARRIERS

February 19, 1929: A bill to regulate the operation of motor carriers on public highways, again introduced December 16, 1929, and again January 8, 1932, and again March 23, 1933. This legislation has been long sought by railroad employees. Hearings by the committee are now being held, and probably a law on the subject will soon be passed.

FOR RELIEF OF THE UNEMPLOYED

December 2, 1930: A bill to appropriate funds for the relief of the destitute unemployed, again introduced December 8, 1931. On June 3, 1932, a bill to use Army supplies for the relief of the destitute unemployed. Mr. HUDDLESTON originated this type of legislation. Alone and single-handed he spoke and fought for it, while all others in Congress, as well as the public, were opposing it as a "dole." He foresaw that the depression would be long and devastating and advocated a system of Federal relief. He was called a "radical" and a "socialist" by other Members and in the press; but never daunted, he continued his efforts until his views were accepted and the present welfare work is the result. It is only fair to him to say that, skimpy though the relief may be, every beneficiary owes him a debt of gratitude. In his speech on December 4, 1930, he said in part:

> The argument against a proposal for direct relief is that it will undermine thrift and industry. Granted that it will, the consequences will not be half as serious as a failure to relieve wide-spread destitution. Direct relief will be less injurious to the morale of the people than for our Government to stand helpless and aloof in the presence of wholesale suffering.
> The argument will also be made that direct relief savors of the socialistic. I may grant that also, but I reply that it is no new departure. There are many precedents. Time and again our Government has granted direct relief in times of emergency. We have assumed to relieve destitution and suffering in times of fire, flood, and wide-spread calamity. I remember the controversy during Cleveland's administration for aid for the drought-stricken farmers of Texas. Numerous similar grants have been made. In 1919, just after the World War, $100,000,000 was voted for the relief of the starving populations of certain European countries. Again, in 1921, $20,000,000 was voted to feed the starving in Russia. If we may feed Europe's hungry millions, surely we need not ignore the pangs of our own.

Again, in his speech on February 11, 1931, he said:

> From the beginnings of organized society men have had regard for the sufferings of their fellow creatures. Governments back to the beginning have always had regard for the starving and miserable among their citizens. Never in all history can it be said, unless it may now be said of the American Government, that a government has been oblivious of such suffering.

Also:

> We are now confronted by the spectacle of men in authority, who supported grants from the Treasury to feed famishing Europeans, but who now refuse food to starving Americans.

PUBLIC WORKS FOR RELIEF

December 8, 1931: A bill to provide for a system of public works for the relief of the unemployed, reintroduced May 23, 1932. This bill was the precursor of the present P.W.A. and C.W.A. Advocated by Mr. HUDDLESTON at a time when it was unpopular, work under Federal direction is now being afforded to 4,000,000 of C.W.A. employees. Mr. HUDDLESTON originated this system. He advocated it when no others would do so. He is entitled to a large share of the gratitude of those who are now employed by the C.W.A. for his efforts for their relief.

Of course, it is not merely by bills offered that the value of a Congressman may be weighed. His true worth is frequently better shown by his position on measures offered by others. Putting this test to Mr. HUDDLESTON, we find him, at the outset of his career in 1916, supporting the Adamson 8-hour law, advocated by railroad employees, and under which they are working today. Agitation is now being raised for a 6-hour day; but at the time of the adoption of the Adamson law, it marked a long advance in the limitation of hours and was hailed by labor as a great victory.

CHILD LABOR AMENDMENT

We also find Mr. HUDDLESTON in 1924 supporting and fighting for the child labor amendment to the Constitution. When it was passed in the House, against the opposition of the great majority of southern Congressmen, he did not hesitate to differ from his associates from Alabama and other Southern States on this great humanitarian measure.

THE TRANSPORTATION ACT, 1920

The Esch-Cummins bill (Transportation Act, 1920): During the troubled period in which this bill was being considered, Mr. HUDDLESTON stood like a stone wall in opposition to the labor clauses, so much objected to by railroad employees. He spoke repeatedly in opposition and voted with labor upon every roll call. His speeches were a strong presentation of the cause of labor as it was affected by this bill.

THE PEOPLE'S LEGISLATIVE SERVICE

Seeing the need of some organization to combat the propaganda being carried on by the railroads against their employees, in 1920 the People's Legislative Service was organized by Warren S. Stone, grand chief of the engineers, W. T. Johnson, president of the machinists, Senator ("Old Bob") La Follette, Basil Manly, and George Huddleston. It was financed by labor and functioned with great efficiency in their interest for some 10 years. Under its auspices, in 1923, was held the National Conference on Railroads in Chicago, one of the most unique meetings ever held.

THE RAILROAD-SHOP STRIKE

1922: During the big shop strike, Mr. HUDDLESTON spoke at every railroad center in Alabama—his audience at Decatur was estimated at 7,000; also spoke in Pennsylvania—explaining the justice of the workers' cause. This was a very unpopular strike with the business interests, and by his open stand for the strikers he made many lasting enemies.

THE HOWELL-BARKLEY BILL

Labor writhed under the unfair labor provisions of the Esch-Cummins Act, so that in 1926 a committee of the organizations drew up what is known as the Howell-Barkley bill. They placed it in the hands of Senator ("Old Bob") La Follette and Congressman HUDDLESTON, for introduction. The latter thought it better policy for the bill to be fathered by Mr. BARKLEY, as he was then ranking Democrat on the committee. Together, Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. HUDDLESTON and other friends of labor fought for the bill in committee and before the House. The effort to bring it to final action ended in failure after 21 aye-and-no votes had been taken. HUDDLESTON was with labor on every vote. His speech on the bill, Peace in the Railroad Labor World, is said to be one of the best of his speeches. It was listened to in the House with close attention and had great effect. Out of the bitter struggle over this bill came the compromise between the rail executives and the employees, known as the Railway Labor Act. Mr. HUDDLESTON took a leading part in securing the passage of this act in the form advocated by labor, and it is now the law.

RAILROAD CONSOLIDATION

If Mr. HUDDLESTON had done nothing else for railroad employees, his opposition to railroad consolidation would have won him their lasting gratitude. Beginning in 1927, pressure from railroad and banking interests arose in behalf of consolidation into a few great systems. The employees saw the danger, not only of the loss of their jobs, but of the vast power which would have been lodged in the hands of a few great executives. However, already Mr. HUDDLESTON had begun his opposition to these measures. In his Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, on which he has served for 13 years and is now in a position of great influence as ranking Democrat, he threw all his weight against all consolidation proposals—he fought them in committee and on the floor of the House. When finally, through the large Republican majority, the Parker consolidation bill was voted out by the committee, he it was who wrote the minority report, so strong and convincing that the majority dared not attempt the passage of the bill. From the beginning of the agitation down to the present, he has been the most important factor in opposing it.

When President Hoover advocated the consolidation of all northern and eastern roads into four great systems, it was Mr. HUDDLESTON who challenged Mr. Hoover's position on the floor of the House and showed the dangers flowing from it.

CONSCRIPTION OF LABOR

A service to labor not widely known was Mr. HUDDLESTON'S fight on the proposal to conscript labor and property for war. In 1930 a resolution to investigate what should be done on this subject was considered in the House. He fought the labor clause to a finish. He spoke against it in the House, and from the floor offered and secured the adoption of an amendment which struck out the reference to labor and forbade any consideration of the conscription of labor. Those pressing this bill were chiefly interested in a means to force labor to work for industry during an emergency. Mr. HUDDLESTON called that "slavery." When he had succeeded in striking it from the bill, the committee made a perfunctory report, and there the matter was dropped.

THE RAILWAY COORDINATOR BILL

Lastly, in June 1933, when the railway coordinator bill was considered by the committee, it was found that under the provisions for consolidation of traffic wholesale reductions in employees would probably result. The railroad-labor organizations were greatly alarmed, and presented many amendments to meet this evil. Mr. HUDDLESTON cooperated heartily in securing the adoption of all these amendments, so that the bill as finally passed fully protected the labor interests.

Truly it may be said that labor has never had a better friend in Congress than GEORGE HUDDLESTON.

H.R. 7316

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing H.R. 7316, introduced by me.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert the letter sent to the President of the United States by the former Philippine Resident Commissioner, Hon. Isauro Gabaldon, member of the Philippine delegation now in Washington, on January 18, 1934, discussing the Philippine independence question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter sent to the President of the United States by the former Philippine Resident Commissioner, Hon. Isauro Gabaldon, member of the Philippine delegation now in Washington, on January 18, 1934, discussing the Philippine independence question:

THE FAIRFAX HOTEL,
Washington, D.C., January 18, 1934.

The Honorable the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
The White House, Washington.

MR. PRESIDENT: As a member of the delegation appointed by the Philippine Legislature to deal with the Government of the United States on the question of Philippine independence, I deem it my duty to bring to your attention the grave injustice that would be inflicted upon the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands by a delay in the granting of the freedom for which they fought on fields of battle and have struggled incessantly in times of peace.

Three days ago, on the 15th instant to be exact, Philippine Resident Commissioner CAMILO OSIAS, one of the staunchest supporters of the Hawes-Cutting-Hare law, and who has, using his own words, "just returned from the Philippine Islands after several months spent in visiting various provinces, cities, and municipalities, meeting and conferring not only with our leaders but with the masses of the people", declared on the floor of the House of Representatives "that the Philippine people continue in their firm conviction that the early grant of Philippine independence is the proper solution of American-Filipino relations." He said further that "on this fundamental point the Filipinos are united."

It is important to note in connection with the foregoing statements that they were made by Commissioner OSIAS while pleading for an extension of the time set in the Hawes-Cutting-Hare law for its acceptance by a "concurrent resolution of the Philippine Legislature or by a convention called for the purpose of passing upon that question." I deem it of the highest importance also to call attention to the fact that the lower house of the Philippine Legislature had already passed a bill submitting the Hawes-Cutting-Hare law to the decision of the electorate of the Philippines, and the majority in the Philippine Senate had agreed in caucus to approve it, when those who caused the United States Congress to enact said law and now claim that the Filipino people had been deprived of the opportunity to vote on the question, signed an agreement to submit it to and abide by the decision of the Philippine Legislature.

I am entirely in accord with the statement of the chairman of our delegation that when the Philippine Legislature declined to accept the Hawes-Cutting-Hare law it did so in compliance with the wishes of the overwhelming majority of the people of the Philippine Islands.

TARIFF PROTECTION

I am not unmindful, Mr. President, of the economic set-backs that may follow the immediate granting of Philippine independence, but I cannot share the view that the continuation of the free trade between the United States and the Philippine Islands for a period of 10 years would render the transition from the condition of a dependent country into that of a free and independent nation immune to the inconveniences—political, social, economic, and otherwise—attending every human reform or departure from a long-established habit or order of things.

In stressing the necessity of a 10-year period of economic readjustment the eventual ruin of the Philippine sugar industry is brought forth as the outstanding illustration. This industry, it is contended, has been built and developed under the protecting wings of the Tariff Act of 1909, and it is further alleged that "This industry is entirely dependent at present for its continued existence upon the tariff protection of the United States." If this statement is correct, the inescapable conclusion is that an extension for 10 or 20 or 50 years of such protection under conditions barring its further expansion would not save the Philippine sugar industry from eventual ruin, thus necessitating the continuation of the present tariff protection for an indefinite period of time.

There is but one course known that can be pursued to place Philippine sugar on a competitive basis, and that is the lowering of the cost of production. This can only be achieved by reducing the prevailing wage scales and overhead in the operation of sugar centrals or by the use of better fertilizers and of sugarcane varieties yielding more sugar without increasing acreage. It is a well-known fact that present wages in the Philippine sugar industry have reached their lowest level, and it is generally conceded that sugar centrals "in the Philippines have already attained a high degree of efficiency" and that "if there would be any room for improvement in that direction it would have very little effect on the cost of production."

It is apparent, therefore, that the extension for any length of time of the privileges at present enjoyed by Philippine sugar in the American market will not enable this product to compete with similar commodity produced in other countries. On the contrary, the maintenance of the present tariff relationship between the United States and the Philippine Islands would hinder the expansion of American sugar industry and retard the reorganization of the Philippine sugar and other industries from a condition of tariff dependency to one of competitive soundness.

If the Philippines were a free and independent nation her industries could be revamped and developed on the basis of fair competition which is the only fundamentally sound economic policy. Reciprocal trade treaties with other countries could be resorted to as a means of offsetting differences in cost of production.

EFFECT OF IMMEDIATE INDEPENDENCE ON THE FINANCES OF THE GOVERNMENT

I submit that the Philippine Government does not have to depend on the income derived from the sugar industry to enable that Government to perform its duties and responsibilities toward the inhabitants of the islands and the world at large.

It is asserted that approximately 40 percent of the revenues of the Philippine Government is contributed by the sugar industry. Granting for the sake of argument that this is correct, I still maintain that this gap in the governmental finances can be spanned by the application of Philippine tariffs on all importations. Under present trade arrangements over 65 percent of the goods imported into the islands is admitted duty free. To this may be added the proceeds from a general reduction in salaries and allowances in the higher brackets of the present governmental structure, which are higher than the salaries and allowances assigned to officials of equivalent category in Great Britain and other European countries, in Japan, and in many of the South American countries. Again, there is ample room in the present governmental organization for further simplification.

In fact, during the last 15 years the revenues of the Philippine Government registered increases and decreases of approximately 20,000,000 pesos without affecting in the least the ability of the Government to meet its bonded indebtedness and to carry on the normal functions of a stable and well-regulated government.

You have, Mr. President, recently stressed the significance of a statement made by the late President Wilson that human liberty is paramount and that it should always receive higher and preferent consideration over trade and other material factors involved in the relationship of the peoples of the earth. In line with this lofty idealism, may I not submit that sugar, coconut oil, and cordage benefit but a negligible minority of the Philippine population? Shall the Filipinos be driven to face a situation similar to that confronting the United States at present, where 15 percent of the population control the wealth and the destinies of the remaining 85 percent?

THE WILL OF THE FILIPINO PEOPLE

I deem it contrary to the expressed will of the people of the Philippine Islands to make the granting of their independence contingent on any consideration other than that specified in the Jones Law, namely, the establishment of a stable government. That this condition had already been met is attested by the message sent by President Wilson to the United States Congress on December 16, 1920. He said: "Allow me to call your attention to the fact that the people of the Philippine Islands have succeeded in maintaining a stable government since the last action of Congress in their behalf." The next logical and honorable step, therefore, that the people and the Government of the United States should take in connection with Philippine-American relations is the restoration of the Philippine Republic.

I am constrained to disagree with the proposals that the grant of Philippine independence be postponed to July 4, 1940; that a more autonomous government be established in the meantime; and that trade relations between the United States and the Philippines be continued as they are under certain limitations, because these proposals involve an unauthorized modification of the will of the Philippine electorate as expressed in every election held in the islands since 1907. On these elections the majorities controlling both houses of the Philippine Legislature were elected on the strength of their pledge that they would petition the Government and appeal to the people of the United States for the granting of "the immediate, absolute, and complete independence" of the Philippine Islands.

Any solution of the Philippine question based on representations amendatory of the expressed will of the electorate of the islands would necessarily involve the un-American and undemocratic decision that those chosen by the people to speak for them have the right to alter the mandate they received from that people. If such theory should be upheld, it would virtually destroy the representative form of government instituted in the Philippines by the United States and successfully maintained by the Filipino people for the past thirty-odd years, setting up in lieu thereof an oligarchy.

RECOMMENDATIONS

For the reasons stated, and true to the aspirations of the people of the Philippine Islands as expressed in every popular election held from 1907 to 1931, inclusive, I beg to recommend the enactment of a law providing substantially the following:

1. The immediate calling of a constitutional convention in the Philippine Islands for the purpose of drafting a constitution for a free and independent government of the Philippine Islands.
2. The submission of this constitution to the people.

3. The holding of elections for the offices provided in the constitution upon adoption thereof.

4. Recognition of the Philippine republic upon the installation of the officials provided in the constitution, not later than 3 years from the date of the enactment of the law.

5. Trade relations to be determined in a conference between representatives of the United States and of the Philippine Islands, to be held at such time and place as the President of the United States may designate after independence shall have been achieved.

Respectfully submitted.

ISAURO GABALDON,
Member, Philippine Delegation.

THE DESTINY OF THE REPUBLICAN MODEL OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech delivered by Hon. CHARLES M. BAKEWELL, of Connecticut, at Niles, Ohio, January 29, in commemoration of the ninety-first anniversary of the birth of William McKinley.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech by Hon. CHARLES M. BAKEWELL, of Connecticut, delivered at Niles, Ohio, January 29, 1934, in commemoration of the ninety-first anniversary of the birth of William McKinley:

WHITHER?

These are confusing days, and the people are plainly bewildered. They hail with rejoicing every indication of returning prosperity. They face the future with courage and hope, but there is evident a deep undercurrent of apprehension. Wherever you go, when thoughtful men of either party are met together, where the cloak of partisanship has been cast aside and men speak freely and off the record, they are asking anxiously: What does it all mean; whither are we going? Is the task the Government has undertaken too great for human capacity; will the forces that have been let loose get out of control and bring down in ruin our republican form of government? The President, in his address to Congress on January 3, stated his purpose to bring about "a permanent readjustment of our ways of thinking and, therefore, of many of our social and economic arrangements." With this statement, couched in general terms, no one can take exception, but what precisely does it mean? We have as yet been given no bill of particulars. If this means setting up an entirely new form of government, the people should be informed of that fact and be given an opportunity to pass upon it, for the people still are sovereign.

LIBERTY AND THE REPUBLICAN MODEL OF GOVERNMENT

George Washington, in his immortal Farewell Address to the American People, said: "The preservation of the sacred fires of liberty and the destiny of the republican model of government are, perhaps finally, staked on the experiment intrusted to the American people." In his mind these two things went together: Liberty and the republican model of government. I propose to discuss some aspects of the present crisis with this as a text.

There is a peculiar appropriateness in viewing our problem in this light on this occasion when we are gathered to honor the memory of our beloved martyred President, William McKinley, the typical American of our great tradition, sturdy, self-reliant, always eager to serve his fellowmen, guided by a stern sense of duty, and inspired by a lofty patriotism. For him our model of Government was not the symbol of a political creed outworn, but rather the expression of what is highest in human aspiration. He was a statesman of vision, who fought at all times with courage and sincerity for the sanctity of human rights and for the preservation of our constitutional privileges, and for the realization of a Government by the people and not by a few of the people. In his debates, he always kept the discussion on a high plane, never indulging in personalities, never appealing to passion and prejudice, but always seeking by fairness in argument and by sweet reasonableness to reach the understanding and common sense of the people. His speeches are not adorned with the artifices of rhetoric, but they ring with the irrestible eloquence of sincerity and truth.

And there is a special fitness in discussing these problems in this environment, in the heart of what was once known as "New Connecticut", which has already given three Presidents to the United States. And I esteem it a great privilege to carry a message from the parent State to this gathering of Republicans, which includes many descendants of the courageous men and women who, braving the hardships of pioneer life and the menace of savage tribes, came here to found their homes in freedom.

It was in Connecticut that for the first time in history there was set up a free representative government. We have always cherished our independence and been distrustful of every encroachment of the Federal Government upon the rights of our sovereign State. We pride ourselves on being a land of steady habits, where the old virtues of self-reliance, industry, and thrift are still valued, and the Constitution is held in reverence.

These traits you in new Connecticut prize equally and have put the seal of your approval upon them in the very name given to your county, for it is named after Jonathan Trumbull, the great war Governor of Connecticut during the Revolution, first to come out for the cause of the Colonists. He was a close friend of George Washington, who, whenever perplexed by any problem, used to say, "Let us consult Brother Jonathan", meaning Jonathan Trumbull. So that to this day, Brother Jonathan stands as a symbol of the spirit of free America.

"New occasions bring new duties,
Time makes ancient use uncouth"

In placing ourselves at the angle of vision necessary for an appraisal of present conditions and their effect upon the republican model of government, there are certain things that must be recognized. Gone forever is the comfortable optimism of the nineteenth century, with its complacent formulas such as, "The world runs round and the world runs well", or, "God's in his Heaven, all's right with the world"; with its confident assurance that we were on the right road and moving forward as fast as could reasonably be expected; and that time and a little patience and trust in the ancient idols whose American names were "manifest destiny" and "the logic of events" were all that was needed to bring about the realization of the dream of our fathers.

The devastating consequences of the dark years of the world-wide depression brought a rude awakening. The grim spectacle of poverty widespread in a land of plenty, of millions unemployed just at the time when the triumph of the machine had given almost unlimited control over the forces of nature, put an end once and for all to the easy-going acceptance of things as they are. The causes of our woes are many. They are the result, in part, of the incredible waste of the World War, and of the shattering of many ancient faiths that resulted, in part, of the unconscionable piling up of huge and unpayable debts; in part, of the selfishness and greed of individuals and of groups. But deeper than all, is the fundamental fact that we have a long way to go to catch up to the machine, to realize what it calls for not only in the shortening of hours and the spread of employment, but also in the reorganization of our social and economic life, and above all, to realize the greater demands it makes on the intelligence and character of the people.

Timorous men have thrown up their hands. Our civilization, they say, has simply outgrown our human capacity to deal with the problems it has created. But thoughtful men had for sometime been eagerly seeking the remedy and hopeful of finding one which would restore the balance between production and consumption, bring about more equitable distribution, more even-handed justice, better equality of opportunity, and at the same time preserve our traditional values of individual liberty, individual initiative and responsibility.

This was the situation when Mr. Roosevelt was inaugurated. His courage, his prompt and forceful action commanded universal approval. Partisanship was less in evidence in the special session of the Seventy-third Congress than at any time within my memory. We Republicans registered opposition in many cases to the methods adopted, but once they were enacted into law, accepted them as the plan of battle and gave our loyal support to the administration in its efforts to make them effective. The President's position had been in effect, we can all agree, as to the objective we seek, and while we may differ as to the method of realizing it, we have no time to argue about it. The patient is too desperately ill for that. We must promptly seize upon that method which seems to promise most, and courageously apply it, while at the same time admitting that it is frankly experimental.

THE CRUCIAL TEST OF DEMOCRACY AND THE WAR FICTION

To understand the situation fully, however, and appreciate our present duty, we must look at the matter from another angle. The most frequent criticism made by political writers of the republican model of government is that while it may work well enough when conditions are favorable, and may weather ordinary storms, it is unable to survive in a great crisis that involves the whole Nation, for the rivalry between the legislative and the executive branches of our Government makes impossible effective and unified action. Supreme emergencies can only be met by a strong centralized power in the hands of the Executive supported by a legislative body subservient to his will.

Our fathers were jealous of their liberties and suspicious of centralized power, and they framed our Constitution, as they fondly supposed, to protect the people and the States from the encroachment of the Federal Government. But they made the Constitution elastic enough so that the President might exercise extraordinary powers in time of war and counted upon the spirit of loyalty, which war intensifies, to keep the Congress from hampering his action.

Now, there can be no doubt that the economic crisis through which we have been passing is as serious and menacing as any war. So, by a convenient and plausible fiction, we have declared ourselves in a state of war—war against depression—and have granted the President powers and given him support as a war-time Executive. Mr. Hoover had said that the condition was very like war and had asked for special powers which a hostile Congress denied him. Mr. Roosevelt repeated the same thing and asked for enormously greater powers, and Congress, with surprising docility, granted him what he asked for. In the present session he has asked for still further powers, with every likelihood of receiving everything that he wants.

The powers that have been granted the President are broad and general. They give him control over railroads, industry, labor, farming, currency, and credit. He can, if he should so desire, exercise these powers so as to destroy the republican model of government, and in doing so quench the sacred fires of liberty. The present Congress is not a deliberative body. It goes through the forms in a half-hearted way, but the substance is lacking. It might almost as well adjourn forthwith after passing a single measure which should read somewhat as follows: "All the powers by the Constitution vested in Congress are hereby granted to the President to use at his discretion, and all decisions that he or his agents may make are to be given the force and effect of law." No President has ever had such power as has been given Mr. Roosevelt. The situation is, if one stop to think, terrifying in its possibilities. And yet the people have accepted it with surprising calmness—nay, they have even welcomed it.

They have felt that drastic measures were necessary; they are satisfied that Mr. Roosevelt is a man of high ideals, single-minded in his devotion to the welfare of the people; that he will regard the powers granted him as war-time emergency powers to be used with caution and given up at the earliest possible moment, so that our Government may once again be as our fathers intended it to be, with the old ideals of liberty, of individual independence, individual initiative, and responsibility preserved—but given ever wider application and deeper significance. And they want him to win; we all want him to win.

DANGER SIGNALS

Here is the rub: The methods employed in the recovery program are, by the President's admission, frankly experimental; the powers upon which they rest purely emergency powers. There are not wanting at the present time indications of a desire to make emergency powers part of the permanent policy of the Government; and there are also ominous indications, when the methods fail to bring the looked-for results, indicating some radical defect in the plan, that instead of acknowledging their errors, retracing their steps, and starting over again, those in charge of the work are determined to insist on carrying out the original program by having recourse to the thoroughly un-American methods of force, coercion, intimidation, and regimentation, and by one-sided propaganda involving restrictions on freedom of speech and freedom of the press. These things, if persisted in, will bring about a complete revulsion of public sentiment. But this is just what the President promised not to let happen when setting out on his unchartered course, and we must still take him at his word.

THE DREAM OF THE AGES AND THE TEACHING OF HISTORY

There is a distinction, which the President is fond of emphasizing, between objective and method, to which we must again refer. When we hear the President or any of the finer spirits of his administration talking about the great objective of their endeavors, which they do with great eloquence and persuasiveness, we are all inclined to subscribe to his program, and are apt to overlook the fact that a worthwhile objective does not of itself put the seal of approval on any and every method employed to bring about its realization.

The great objective which is put before us is the ideal that has haunted the imagination of men almost from the dawn of reflective thinking. Some 2,500 years ago a wise old Pythagorean declared that the purpose of government was to secure that freedom which without unity was a delusion and that unity which without freedom was a snare. Despairing of realizing this ideal in a wicked world, the Pythagoreans organized themselves into a brotherhood, carefully recruited, where these ideals might be realized in a community of friends. A few centuries later Plato undertook to draw the picture of the ideal state. It was to be a social order from which selfishness, the desire to get on at the expense of others, which was the root of all evil in the state, had been completely banished; where every citizen had found the job for which he was best fitted and was performing his task in the interest of the community; and all was guided and controlled by the idea of the good. Plato did not, however, make the mistake of supposing that this vision could be realized by any mechanical means. It was, rather, a pattern laid up in heaven, to which the wise should look when setting their own house in order. A few centuries later, the same dream is given new vitality in the teaching of Christianity, with its doctrine of the unique and infinite worth of the individual soul. Unable to realize their ideal in the world as it is, the Christians, too, set up a community apart, the beloved community of the faithful, made one through the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. And from that day to this that vision has been leading men on. It guided our fathers when they came to these shores to establish their homes in freedom. It guided, however unconsciously, the work of the framers of our Constitution when they sought to establish a Government "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal."

But if there is one thing that history conclusively shows, it is that any attempt to bring about forthwith the realization of such high ideals by the mechanics of government is bound to fail. Human nature does not change much from age to age, and everyone begins life as a selfish, self-centered animal. To the ardent reformer, the next step possible may take one a pitifully short distance toward the realization of his ideal, but if it is the next step possible, it is the only step that will take him in that direction at all.

INTELLIGENT SUPPORT OF THE PRESIDENT

Now, I think that part of the popularity of the President is due to the response in the minds of men to the appeal which this great ideal makes, and that they are inclined to be uncritical as to the implications of the methods employed to bring about its realization, and are openly hostile to those who seek to raise a word of caution. We are all expected to support the President. I, for my part, believe that we should support him, but I maintain that intelligent support on the part of a legislative body does not mean dumb, supine acquiescence in everything that he may suggest. There is, indeed, no place for captious and obstructive criticism; but the deliberate and critical study of the proposals that are made is the plain duty of Congress. No greater disservice can be done to the administration, nor can there be any greater disloyalty to the country, than to suppose that the duty of the legislative body is simply to say yes to Executive proposals. It is, I think, most unfortunate that the President should have dismissed from his inner council the men who did not see eye to eye with him in the matter of policies. The methods, he has said, are frankly experimental. Every scientist engaged in experiment knows that often his severest critics are his most helpful collaborators. Inasmuch as he has done this, however, it is all the more imperative that Congress should exercise fully and freely its rights and perform its constitutional duties, and see to it that no action is taken without full and free discussion, through which alone the people can be kept informed of the full significance of what is being done. If the Democratic majority shirks this responsibility, the duty of the minority party is made so much the more evident. Many dangerous things are being done, many which threaten the very existence of the republican model of government. We should hearken to the words of President McKinley, in his speech at the Lincoln Day banquet, just 40 years ago: "The Republican Party values its principles no less in defeat than in victory. It holds to them after a reverse as before, because it believes in them; and believing in them is ready to battle for them. * * * Without discouragement, our great party reaffirms its allegiance to Republican doctrines, and with unshaken confidence seeks again the public judgment through public discussion."

THE THREAT TO THE REPUBLICAN MODEL OF GOVERNMENT

I have only time to enumerate a few of the more formidable dangers we are facing. Foremost among these is the virtual destruction of the freedom of the press, for in any reasonable interpretation of the spirit of the amendment which guarantees that freedom, the radio must be included. For the great mass of the people, it is the chief source of information available, and this is absolutely controlled by the administration. Its representatives and apologists have free access to the air and send out daily glowing reports of the progress of the recovery program, ignoring or belittling all difficulties and dangers that have been encountered or are threatened. If one seeks the opportunity to send over the air the other side of the picture in an endeavor to arouse the people to safeguard our liberties ere it is too late, one is forbidden to do so, and the explanation given that nothing can be put over the air without approval of the administration. No more deadly blow could be given to the republican model of government. Even Republican newspapers are in many cases indirectly controlled and dare utter only feeble protests.

Reports are coming in from every part of the land of graft and corruption and the playing of party politics in the distribution of jobs under the Civil Works Administration. The administration, aroused by these reports, has already taken steps to prevent the recurrence of these things, but it can only succeed if it has the support and cooperation of public-spirited citizens in the several communities.

There has been a terrific centralization of government in Washington. More than a score of bureaus have been set up which are in many cases being turned into formidable political machines. Our dual form of government has all but disappeared.

There has been an appalling waste in the expenditure of the people's money in building elaborate post offices far beyond the needs of the communities affected, and in embarking on many enterprises that Congress had already turned down as unwise and unnecessary. Apparently all this is done in order to stimulate capital industries, but there can be no real recovery for these industries save one that is based on normal development of business. This involves long-time credit, and that requires confidence which has yet to be restored.

The Government has been going into business in competition with private industry. More than half a million dollars has been allocated for putting up a plant in West Virginia to make post-office equipment, when there are factories in Connecticut, New York, Indiana, and elsewhere which are engaged in this particular business and will be forced to close down or greatly reduce their working force by the unfair competition thus initiated by the Government. The Government has been enticing communities, already well supplied, to borrow money in order to build their own light and power plants, and in doing so, destroy the established industries and do wrong to its citizens, to the widows and orphans, and to the educational and charitable institutions that have in good faith invested in these securities. Furthermore, if this is carried much further the safety of our insurance companies will be jeopardized.

A huge deficit is being piled up to which there seems no limit. If no check is put on this tendency, we are headed for disastrous inflation.

The farm program has not brought the results expected. Hundreds of millions have been given to farmers and cotton growers to reduce their acreage in the hope of reducing the crop, but without succeeding in bringing about this result. The suggestion is now being made that we must go further and that it will be necessary to have a complete regimentation both of farming and of industry, which means that we should be headed directly toward a sovietized form of government.

One of the most momentous bills ever to come before Congress, the so-called "monetary" or "gold" bill, was rushed through the House a week ago Saturday with almost no consideration. The committee that reported it had not held adequate hearings. The strange excuse was offered that since the experts disagreed, there was no necessity for consulting any of them.

In any scientific matter when the experts disagree, that is of itself evidence that the problem is extremely difficult and complex, and is a warning to go cautiously, and not to act until after full and complete deliberation. The attitude taken by Congress called for action in ignorance, guided by emotion, passion, and prejudice. It was conduct worthy of no party save the Know-nothing Party. This was a bill that, under guise of stabilizing currency, placed the huge sum of $2,000,000,000 in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, with no check upon its use save that which may be imposed by the President, with huge powers to buy and sell foreign exchange, American securities, and other things—in short, power to rig the market and deceive the people and do all those things which are now recognized as a shame and disgrace amongst men. And all of this power has been put in the hands of a political appointee, with possibilities for its misuse for political purposes that are almost without limit; and all that he may do is to be shrouded in secrecy for a period of 3 years; that is, until after the next Presidential election. The bill virtually scrapped the Federal Reserve System which the Democrats have always boasted of as their great constructive achievement.

DUTY OF THE MINORITY PARTY

The duty of the minority party in this extremity is to work unceasingly to bring the country back to constitutional government, to resist Federal encroachment, to save the republican model of government and thus preserve the sacred fires of liberty. It is up-hill work with the Democrats in complete control of the air, building up through far-flung bureaucracies a formidable political machine, and using public funds for political ends.

NEED OF NEW ALIGNMENT

Circumstances have made the Republican Party the party of order and stability. The Republican sees first the good things that civilization has produced, the blessings that have been won through centuries of struggle for freedom, and is determined to preserve them. He sees also the evils that still persist and wants to get rid of them, for he knows that with nations as with individuals to stand still is to degenerate; that progress is the price of stability. But he clings to the funded experience of the past, and would build upon that. He agrees with Edmund Burke when he wrote, "We are afraid to put men to live and trade each on his own private stock of reason, because we suspect that this stock in each man is small, and that the individuals would do better to avail themselves of the general bank and capital of nations and of ages."

The Democrat, on the other hand, sees first the evils that are present and would get rid of them. If he is wise he sees also the good and wants to preserve that, but he is less solicitous about that, and more inclined to rash experiments. Perhaps there is not a great deal of difference noticeable when the ship is running on an even keel between the liberal conservative on the one side and the conservative liberal on the other. But each party has its camp followers. On the Republican side far down the line are the reactionary standpatters, so far down that they can see only the good, and, being themselves comfortably placed, are annoyed at all suggestion of change. They are the dead weight our party has to carry. On the Democratic side far down on the left, so far that they can see only the evils, are the radicals ranging from pink to blood red, to the revolutionists for whom the wisdom of the past is but hoary folly. These are the packages of dynamite in the Democratic train.

You may say that this is not an accurate description, for we can readily name men who call themselves Republicans who belong on the Democratic side of this picture. Perhaps that is because in their communities the Republican label has a cash value for vote-getting purposes. And we could as readily name Democrats who belong on the Republican side. Perhaps they come from those States in the South which have virtually but one party, and that the Democratic, so that they have nowhere else to go. But in the main the description given is true, and corresponds to a psychological difference in human nature.

We need a fresh alignment of parties with new names—names that are not colored by emotion, or blurred by passion, so that the liberal conservatives and the conservative liberals can combine to save our republican model of government. These groups have far more in common with each other than has either group with the radicals on the one hand and the standpatters on the other.

We Republicans are determined to safeguard our great tradition and to build upon the past as we push forward to the better day that is to be. We know that the wisdom of the past lives on in the present, else were today's wisdom naught but tomorrow's folly. Into our institutions and ideals that wisdom has flowed if they have aught of value. It is not a new model of government that we need but intelligent and conscientious use of the opportunities which our present model provides. No democratic government can be better than the citizens who compose it. What is needed is more loyalty, more devotion, more willingness to serve.

THE INDOMITABLE SPIRIT OF AMERICA

I particularly deprecate the loose and irresponsible talk of those who assert that if we do not simply accept the administration program without question. we are headed for bolshevism or fascism. The truth is rather that this menace lurks in that program itself. Besides, such statements show little understanding of the indomitable spirit of America. We cherish too well our liberties won through centuries of hard struggle to think of surrendering them in exchange for the yoke of an external and absolute authority and the consequent regimentation of life. We should take heart from the fact that although the recently established democracies in the Old World have proved unequal to the strain, not a single democratic government with a long history behind it has succumbed. Should the recovery program fail utterly, we should, however saddened, try again and in the American way—the way of cooperation and mediation, not of coercion and dictation. America has never yet lost a war, and we shall not lose this war on depression. But, should the radicals gain control of the administration, the Republicans will speedily be placed in command, for the people still believe in democracy, and would regard any result that involved the loss of our liberties and the complete regimentation of life as a defeat and not a victory.

However, it is not a simple question of success or failure. Like every human endeavor, the program will fail to meet the expectations of its most enthusiastic and optimistic supporters. Unforeseen complications continue to slow up the program, especially in the case of capital industries. Any number of difficult problems remain to be solved. This is only what was to have been expected in attempting to carry out a comprehensive plan including a social and economic reorganization, which must depend in the last analysis upon the revivifying of the moral and spiritual life of the people. We must carry on in the spirit of friendly cooperation and mutual understanding, recognizing no special privileges for any class or group. But you cannot change human nature overnight. We shall have to cultivate the virtue of patience; and remember that the millennium cannot be realized day after tomorrow.

THE LONG-RANGE VIEW

If you will keep in mind the long range, and if the dangers I have indicated can be removed, one will have cause for satisfaction over progress that has been made. We have been having impressed upon us the absolute need in a machine age of better cooperation, better coordination of effort. A new spirit is abroad in the land, the spirit of national unity and national endeavor, directed by friendly and willing cooperation and inspired by mutual friendliness. In this spirit we shall yet win through to victory in the war against depression, while remaining true to the fundamental principles of our democratic government.

THE VITALITY OF REPUBLICAN PRINCIPLES

Let us cherish our faith in America and in its model of government. As William James once wrote: "Democracy with us is a kind of religion. We are bound not to admit its failure. The best of us are filled with a contrary vision of democracy struggling through every error until its institutions glow with justice, its customs shine with beauty. Our better men shall show the way and we shall follow them. The ceaseless whisper of the more permanent ideals, the steady tug of truth and justice, give them time enough, must warp the world in their direction."

Building on the funded experience of the past and pinning our faith on these enduring values, our republican principles of government will never lack vitality.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BOEHNE, for 4 days, on account of business.

To Mr. RANSLEY, on account of death in family.

TAXING INCOMES OR TAKING PROFITS—WHICH? (REVENUE ACT OF 1935)

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] may extend his remarks upon the Revenue Act of 1935.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, in a few days the new revenue bill of 1934 making certain changes in the income taxes will come before this House for consideration.

While Congress was in recess the subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee has worked all summer and fall in an effort to close the loopholes in the law through which unscrupulous corporations and individuals have scandalously escaped taxation.

Nothing can be said except in the highest commendation of its work; nevertheless, without intending any disparagement, it will have to be admitted that it has not gone far enough. It has not closed all the gaps.

DEFECTS IN INCOME TAX LAW

The defects in our income tax laws are basic. They have to be found in a fundamental error in the conception and interpretation of definitions.

The income tax, as a system of raising revenue, was primarily intended as a tax on incomes; not, as is now so generally taken for granted, as a tax on net incomes or profits—after various ingenuities and questionable expedients have been resorted to—to reduce the amount on which the tax is to be calculated.

In other words, we have to confess that in the past we have not been enacting income taxes at all but a most complicated system of profit taxes.

The whole broad basic conception of the true principle of the income-tax method of raising revenue has been disregarded. We have persistently and perversely loaded down the law with exceptions, exemptions, deductions, and allowances so that the Federal income has been ridiculously below the returns we have had the right to expect.

The plain, blunt truth is that every income tax law we have ever had has been largely a "game refuge" for the rich to escape taxation. And that has been true, even where the law has been so framed as to give the ostentatious appearance of "soaking the rich."

THE INCOME TAX DERIVED FROM THE TITHE SYSTEM

The income tax is founded on the tithe system—in other words, the simplest form of taxation—where each citizen gave up a flat percentage of his crop, his produce, or his earnings for the support of his government. We seem to have wholly abandoned that concept and elaborated a complicated system of taxing profits. The evil of this departure can easily be conceived without argument or example; but, it so happens, that our bitter experiences of the past few years furnish us with both.

In the first place, the moment you try to estimate profits, you enter into labyrinths of cupidity and avarice and the government becomes instantly at the mercy of the selfish interests from which the details are to be derived.

Then, when attempts are made to estimate exemptions, allowances, and so forth, the Government is confronted with deceit, falsehood, and outright fraud. The revelations of the Senate investigation furnished numerous examples which shocked, amazed, and disgusted the entire Nation.

In practical operation this method of applying the income tax as a profits tax has proven itself to be a dismal failure.

For these reasons I have been fighting for 2 years to get back to the fundamental principle of taxing incomes instead of profits. I have realized that where a custom has been long established it is difficult to get public opinion to welcome any innovation. Therefore in my proposal I have only gone as far as to suggest the hitching on to the machinery of the old tax system a stabilized and fraud neutralizer in the nature of a 1-percent tax on the gross incomes shown on the returns in addition to the computed tax on the net income.

When I introduced my original resolution on May 7, 1932, my object was to lay before Congress the immense revenue to be derived from this simple, direct tax and thus avoid the increases in the income tax which were then contemplated.

I also was anxious to avoid the cut in the Federal employees' salaries and in veterans' compensation which certain officious, smug organizations were even then advocating—the members of which, as was afterwards revealed, were the real beneficiaries of the loopholes in our tax system.

I tried to interest some of the Federal employees in backing up my proposed 1-percent tax on all incomes, but I made no headway. One chap nonchalantly retorted (he was getting $4,000 a year): "Why the ——— should I pay $40 a year under your plan, when I don't have to pay anything at all now?"

I replied, "Because the economy boys will soon be cutting off much bigger slices from your salary." He laughed then, but with hundreds of thousands of other Federal employees he is now repenting over the loss of 15 percent, instead of only 1 percent.

At the time I made this proposition I submitted an analysis of the income-tax returns of 1930, which showed that over 50 percent of the corporations filing returns showed no net income whatever, and, therefore, paid not a cent of taxes.

I showed that nearly 50 percent of the individuals filing returns also escaped taxation. Subsequent revelations in the Senate committee showed that the list of slackers included some of the wealthiest men in the Nation.

In the figures I then analyzed full returns were not available, but today we have at our disposal the Treasury statistics of incomes for 1932, and I append herewith two charts which I have compiled and arranged from official figures showing the corporation returns for 1930, 1931, and 1932 and the individual returns for 1931 and 1932.

AMAZING FIGURES

It will be seen at a glance that in 1930, 518,736 corporations filed returns. Of these, only 221,420 showed net incomes on which they paid taxes.

Note that 287,316 paid no taxes whatever, ducking their responsibility, either on the ground that they were inactive or that their business showed no net income. Yet 241,616 of these nontaxpaying corporations showed a gross income of $46,500,564,065. If they had paid 1 percent on this amazing sum (amazing for businesses not supposed to be thriving) the Government would, as it should, have received $465,005,640.

With individual incomes, the evasions were nearly in the same proportion. In that year, 1930, out of 3,376,552 individuals filing returns, 1,429,877 showed, or purported to show, that they had no net incomes and paid no tax whatever, although their returns showed on their face a gross income of $21,665,505,860.

If they had paid their tithe of 1 percent it would have yielded $216,655,058.

Thus, from both sources, corporations and individuals, the Government could have collected $681,660,698 in revenues that were allowed wholly to escape, simply because we permitted ourselves to think that an income tax should be a profits tax instead of a tithe tax, as it was really intended to be.

But that is not all. The Government would not only have collected the tithe from the gross income of those ducking all taxation, but also from those which did not have the face to pretend that their books showed "no profits."

From this source the Government would have realized from corporations an additional $895,614,950 and from individuals $137,642,946, or a total gain of $1,033,357,896 over the routine income under the existing income-tax provisions.

Altogether, in that year of 1930, the income tax to be realized, if fortified by the 1-percent tax, would have been as follows:

Corporations	$2,072,324,490
Individuals	690,344,621
Total	2,762,679,111

And there would have been no deficits to face in the ensuing years.

A STUDY OF THE CHARTS REVEALS SOME SIGNIFICANT FACTS

For instance, note how the number of returns showing net income have steadily decreased, and, inversely, how those showing no net income have increased:

First. In the case of corporations the net-income returns have decreased from 221,420 in 1930 to only 78,775 in 1932, while those showing, or purporting to show no net incomes have increased from 241,616 in 1930 to 348,954 in 1932.

Second. In the case of individuals the net income returns have decreased from 1,946,675 in 1930 to 1,864,969 in 1932; while those showing no net income have increased from 1,429,877 to 1,895,433 in 1932.

INCOME TAX OR PROFITS TAX

Sooner or later the American people are going to make up their minds not to be fooled any longer by the absurdities of the present income-tax system and will put it up to Congress whether we are going to have a real income tax or continue the present practice of imposing simply a profits tax, which invites frauds and evasions.

BROADEN THE BASE

The census of 1930 shows that there were 36,994,695 persons, 25 years and over, who were gainfully employed. Of these, according to the same source, there were 18,882,794 persons gainfully employed earning salaries of over $1,500 per year. Under European methods all such would pay taxes. Of these 18,882,794 persons only 1,429,675 made taxable returns. There is, therefore, a wide margin of perhaps 15,000,000 individuals in the United States who I am certain would be willing to contribute their share to the expenses of the Government instead of, as now, being put at the foot of the tax structure where all the piled up and accumulated taxes imposed directly and indirectly upon the upper layers are relentlessly shifted and shaken down inevitably upon their unfortunate backs.

MAKING CITIZENS TAX-CONSCIOUS

Such a policy, if inaugurated, would not only broaden the base of taxation, a desideratum upon which all tax experts are agreed, but it would fortify and encourage a spirit of tax consciousness and expand their sense of good citizenship.

With the base of taxation thus broadened and made practically universal, the ratio of the tax could be graduated and the profits idea as the basis of income-tax competition could be finally abandoned. With that object accomplished, the host of petty nuisance taxes on every social and economic phase of modern life would be eliminated.

SOME MAXIMS OF TAXATION

The simpler the tax the more effectively may it be enforced, with the minimum of overhead for collection.

The greater the base the lighter the load on each, a principle having its counterpart and analogy in physics. Everyone knows that each leg of a four-legged table bears a lighter load than an individual leg in a three-legged table.

THE FAILURE OF THE PROFITS OR NET INCOME-TAX METHOD

Under the present system the receipts from the income tax as at present devised and administered are constantly dwindling. The tax collections on corporations have fallen from $711,703,900 in 1930 down to $277,689,311 in 1932.

In the same period the collections from individuals have dropped from $473,689,563 in 1930 down to $324,744,617 in 1932.

To make up for these deficits Congress has been obliged to step up the receipts by a resort to increases in postage and taxes on gasoline, on checks, on admissions to amusements, and a host of other nuisance taxes.

A RATIONAL PLAN

A rational plan to meet the situation is to revive and reinstate the modest income-tax rates of Public Resolution No. 23, Seventy-first Congress, which was approved December 16, 1929, and which was superseded by the unprofitable tax rates incorporated in the Revenue Act of 1932.

With these modest rates restored and the loopholes in the 1932 law closed up as planned in the pending bill, an additional special tax on incomes—not net incomes or profits—will yield a constant and reliable income to the Government.

The House Joint Resolution No. 186, which I introduced May 19, 1933, provides for a special tax of 1 percent, but the special tax or tithe need not be 1 percent. It might even be half of 1 percent. The rate could be changed from year to year to meet the varying needs of the annual Budget.

By this method we can not only get rid of the nuisance taxes, but dispose, once and for all, of the propaganda for the manufacturers sales tax, the consumers sales tax, the "soak-the-rich" tax, and every other scheme of taxation emanating from the brains of certain individuals who conceive that the only function of government is to pester its citizens with provocative taxes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman tell us about the program for tomorrow?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, it is expected that the Committee on Appropriations will present a resolution making a small appropriation for the enforcement of the Liquor Act for the District of Columbia. The committee also proposes probably to present a resolution making an appropriation for the C.W.A. and P.W.A. administrations.

Mr. SNELL. Will that come up tomorrow?

Mr. BYRNS. Probably so, but it can only come by unanimous consent. The committee will report it. Then, in addition to that, the appropriation bill for the State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor Departments will be presented.

Mr. SNELL. I think, perhaps, in regard to the C.W.A. matter we ought to have the testimony given by Mr. Hopkins before the committee today before we consider that matter.

Mr. BYRNS. I understand that if that resolution is reported, the gentleman from Texas proposes to ask unanimous consent to take it up. Of course, a single objection will prevent that, and it will come up later on.

Mr. SNELL. I dislike very much to object, but I think we ought to have the evidence that Mr. Hopkins gave before the committee today, before the House. I think we are entitled to that on a matter of such tremendous importance.

Mr. BYRNS. Under those circumstances, that resolution will not come up.

Mr. SNELL. I wish the gentleman would give us time to at least look that over.

Mr. BYRNS. I think the gentleman is entitled to that and the House is entitled to it.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, a gentleman on the opposite side of the House, whose name I do not recall, just now, made a statement which I believe entitles me to a matter of personal privilege. I shall not prefer that at this moment, but I want it understood that at the proper time I shall prefer that request.

TAX ON OIL AND GAS

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point and appropriately referred three communications from residents of Pennsylvania relating to the oil industry. The first, written by Hon. Frank E. Baldwin, auditor general of Pennsylvania, and the second, written by Mr. J. R. Livezey, express alarm and protest against the report that the Secretary of the Treasury is recommending elimination of the percentage depletion clause of the revenue act, while Mr. J. Stratmeyer, of Reading, Pa., advises that the oil industry seeks relief from the 1-cent excise tax on oil and gasoline.

There being no objection, the communications were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR GENERAL,
Harrisburg, January 27, 1934.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
United States Senator, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR DAVIS: Our oil producers in this section of Pennsylvania are very much alarmed by the report that the Treasury Department is recommending the elimination of the percentage depletion clause in sections 114 (b) (2), (3), and (4).

Section 114 (b) (3) is the one that provides for percentage depletion for oil and gas wells. The oil industry is very important in Pennsylvania, and if this section were eliminated it would impose a very great hardship upon the producers of McKean County, as they are producing oil under a flooding system which means they get the oil out of the ground much sooner than they otherwise would and the depletion of a territory is very large.

Will you not interest yourself in seeing that section 114 (b) (3) is retained in any new revenue act that may be passed? I assure you your interest will be appreciated by all of those engaged in the oil business.

Trust you are in the best of health, and with kind personal regards, I remain, yours sincerely,

F. E. BALDWIN.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., January 23, 1934.

Hon. JAMES DAVIS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR DAVIS: The Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives is considering certain changes in the present income tax law which will vitally affect any oil- or gas-producing properties.

The present Federal income tax law provides for a depletion deduction of 27½ percent of the gross income or 50 percent of the net income derived from oil and gas properties. The subcommittee has recommended a 25-percent reduction in such allowance. The Secretary of the Treasury has recommended the entire elimination of such allowance. If either of these recommendations is adopted, a heavy increase in Federal income tax will be imposed upon everyone deriving income from oil and gas properties.

The equity and justice of such allowances have been recognized in all Federal income tax laws during the past 15 years. Although the methods of determining the amount of such allowances have been changed from time to time, Congress has never seen fit to deprive people owning oil royalties or engaged in the oil business of these just and reasonable allowances. In view of the serious and detrimental effect which the elimination of these allowances would have upon us and everyone engaged in the oil business, I would most sincerely ask you to demand that the fair and reasonable provisions of the present law be left undisturbed.

Yours very truly,

JOHN R. LIVEZEY.

READING, PA., January 23, 1934.

Senator JAMES J. DAVIS,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: The oil industry as a whole is endeavoring to be relieved of the unjustifiable tax which is placed on gasoline and motor oils. Taking our particular industry as a whole, we do not feel that the tax should be so apportioned that it is unfair to that particular industry compared with taxation on all others. In fact, when you consider the State tax as well as the Federal tax, and the cost price of the product, it would, in our estimation, seem to be a case of confiscation.

We do not know how you feel regarding this subject, but are passing on our views in the event that there is a possibility of this 1-cent Federal tax being eliminated. We trust that you will act favorably for the oil industry in this respect.

Very truly yours,

PENN SERVICE OIL CO.,
J. STRATMEYER.

ANTITRUST LAWS AND INDEPENDENT BUSINESSES

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD and to lie on the table a telegram from the independent movie association; also a photostatic copy of a letter from the major oil companies touching the interests of the small independent oil companies; and also an article from Sphere under date of February 1934, all touching the subject which I was discussing several days ago concerning the antitrust laws and their effect upon small business.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N.Y., January 25, 1934.

Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH,
United States Senate:

National Board of Directors, Allied States Association of Motion Picture Exhibitors, meeting at Warwick Hotel, direct that your attention be invited to a device resorted to by code authority for motion-picture industry to defeat remedial measures not involving change in law. That body dominated by major producers requires that independents fill unqualified assets to code as condition of participating in any degree therein, thereby waiving all right and approving in advance everything this code authority may do. We have filed suit to test their right to do this and are advised defense of proceeding will be handled by N.R.A., thus making it appear we are opposing the Government. Major producers are violating code provisions against forcing short subjects with feature pictures and protecting themselves by stamping on contract that the exhibitor has agreed to purchase excess number and requiring exhibitor to initial the clause. This is cited to show how large units being in absolute power can and do exact agreements and waivers which will preclude independents from contesting monopolistic practices before boards. We greatly deplore that efforts to enlist interest of General Counsel Richberg elicited only condescending and evasive letter from a subordinate attorney.

By direction of the board.

ABRAM F. MYERS, Chairman.

COLEMAN, TEX., January 18, 1934.

To whom it may concern:

The writer is a member of the new pool committee in Texas under the code of fair competition for the petroleum industry, and respectfully calls your attention to the necessity of filing a report by January 31, 1934, showing agreed plan of development. This is necessary to the legal shipment of oil from any new pool.

The new pool is defined as "any commercially productive accumulation of crude petroleum (whether located in a field, area, or horizon heretofore known as productive or otherwise) discovered after January 1, 1933, and/or in which 10 commercially producing wells had not been completed by September 13, 1933."

The plan requires presentation of maps showing ownerships, present and proposed development and probable outlines of the pool, and must include several provisions which have received rather wide publication, such as in the Star Telegram issues of December 24, 1933, and January 14, 1934, and probably the various oil journals have included this in recent issues, including the Oil and Gas Journal issue of January 18, 1934, page 10.

The chairman of the Texas new pool committee is Fred Sealey, of the Texas Co., Houston, Tex., and other members are H. E. Marsh, of the Amerada Petroleum Corporation, Fort Worth; T. E. Swigert, Shell Petroleum Co., Houston, Tex. Six copies of the report must be submitted and signatures must be sworn to before a notary public. No set form has been proposed, and it is apparently up to the owners of each new pool to adopt some definite plan in keeping with conservation and stability of the industry. Two of these copies must be filed with the Petroleum Administrative Board, Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C. (attention of Mr. J. W. Steele), by January 31, 1934, with single copies to the following:

E. H. Eddleman, care of the Planning and Coordinating Committee, Willard Hotel, Washington, D.C.
J. D. Collett, Fort Worth, Tex.
L. E. Barrows, P.O. box 1160, Fort Worth, Tex.
Fred C. Sealey, care of the Texas Co., Houston, Tex.

Yours very truly,

M. G. CHENEY,

CODES MAKE A SHAMBLES OF SMALL BUSINESS—ANTITRUST LAWS MUST BE RESTORED, SAYS SENATOR BORAH, OR INDEPENDENT BUSINESSES WILL BE DESTROYED—LITTLE BUSINESS SHOULD HAVE ITS OWN SPECIAL CODES

By Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH

Not much is being said about it, probably not much will be said, but a real tragedy is being played out today in American business life, a tragedy which involves anxiety and great suffering, mental and physical, and, in many instances, the sacrifice of pride, place in the community, and at last, turning the key in the door, failure in business, failure in life. The tragedy is that of small business fighting for existence and, in many instances, fighting in vain.

Last October in a public address I called attention to the fact that these business codes were written for big business or written in conformity with the interests of big business. It was almost necessary that they be made to conform to the interests of big business. That by reason of that fact, small business, independent business, was becoming greatly distressed, and that, in my opinion, unless there was a change in the program, small business would be crushed out, destroyed. Some publicity was given to these remarks.

Since that time I have received over 9,000 letters or messages from small business, independent business, confirming more than I had indicated. These men are not chiselers; they are not desirous of impeding a just and sound plan for recovery. They are among the best citizens of our country, asking no more than a chance to play the game under rules fair to small business as well as to big business.

It is no attack upon big business to say that, after all, "small business" constitutes the real strength of our economic structure. It needs no argument to convince any reflecting person that its ruin would be an irreparable loss to the Nation. It needs no argument to prove that the small business man cannot carry on under codes made to conform to the interests of big business.

One of the great items in the situation arises out of the fact that the antitrust laws have been suspended. There is little practical restraint upon the rapacious appetites of some big businesses. Not all. For bigness itself does not necessarily denote greed or meanness of purpose. But it was a sad mistake to lift all restraint from big business by suspending the laws against trusts.

It is true that there is in the National Recovery Act a general statement prohibiting monopoly and monopolistic practices. But in practical effect this seems to be a dead letter. It furnishes no protection to small business.

Trusts and combines and conspiracies and restraint of trade prevail, not only without restraint, but rather under the shelter of the Government. The result is that the small business man must not only do business under codes framed to meet the requirements and in accordance with the necessities of large business, but he is compelled to contend against those practices of great combines which have been used from time immemorial to destroy small business.

Many letters which I have disclose price fixing, price cutting, and all the practical methods heretofore employed but condemned by our courts and condemned by our laws.

It seems to me that the first step we should take in the interest of small business is to restore the antitrust laws; that provision of the National Recovery Act which suspended them should be repealed. They should remain in full force upon the statute books.

This will, in my opinion, not embarrass the administration of the National Recovery Act. It was supposed at the time that act was passed that the antitrust laws would embarrass the administration of the National Recovery Act. But, in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court during the last 30 years, there is no reason to suppose that the fair administration of the National Recovery Act would not come well within the decisions of the Supreme Court as to the meaning of the antitrust laws.

The Industrial Recovery Act has for its object the establishment of fair competition, and the Supreme Court has said that the Sherman Antitrust Act was "not intended to fetter free and fair competition as was commonly understood and practiced by honorable opponents in trade."

No one need fear the Sherman Antitrust Laws or the Clayton Act who desires to carry on a business upon a fair and honorable basis or upon a basis of fair competition.

Secondly, it seems to me that some way must be devised to have different codes for small, independent business institutions and great combines, as it were, as a different condition has to be met, and different rules must necessarily prevail.

It has been said to me, and it has been said elsewhere, that the period of the small business is passing. This brutal doctrine is born of greed upon one hand and of the communistic theory upon the other. It is in the interest of the whole country, in the interest of sound economics, and in the interest of the perpetuity of the institutions under which we live to protect the small business interests of the country.

NATIONAL INCOME, 1929–32 (S.DOC. NO. 124)

As in legislative session,

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in June 1932, I submitted a resolution, which was adopted by the Senate, being Senate Resolution 220, which called upon the Secretary of Commerce—

To report to the Senate of the United States on or before December 15, 1933, estimates of the total national income of the United States for each of the calendar years 1929, 1930, and 1931, including estimates of the portions of the national income originating from agriculture, manufacturing, mining, transportation, and other gainful industries and occupations, and estimates of the distribution of the national income in the form of wages, rents, royalties, dividends, profits, and other types of payments. These estimates shall be prepared by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and the Bureau shall use available official and unofficial statistics and such relevant data as may be in the possessions of the various departments, bureaus, and independent establishments of the Federal Government.

Mr. President, the Department of Commerce has submitted its report under the terms of that resolution, and the report was referred to the Senate Committee on Finance. At the last meeting of the committee I discussed the report with other members of the committee, and, after explaining that it is a very valuable piece of statistical work and is the first official estimate of this character which we have had for many years, I was instructed by the committee to request unanimous consent that the report be printed as a Senate document. Therefore, now, as in legislative session, I make that request. I may say that the action of the committee in making this recommendation was unanimous.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF LOUISIANA PROPAGANDA

As in legislative session,

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate Resolution 158. I cannot call it up without unanimous consent, because there has been no new legislative day since I submitted it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should like to have the resolution read first, to understand what it is.

Mr. LONG. It merely provides for an investigation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Will it require debate?

Mr. BARKLEY. Does it require any appropriation or any expenditure?

Mr. LONG. No; it does not require any at all.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let the resolution be passed over until some of us can look into it. It may be that the resolution ought to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. LONG. No; it does not have to go there. It might have to go to the House of Morgan, but it does not have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The only question is as to whether or not we will investigate the expenditure of money in this city to set up headquarters, to run a publicity bureau, and do other things financed by private interests for the purpose of protecting certain private interests against a Member of the United States Senate. That is all there is to the resolution.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let it go over for the present. I should like to look into it.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Mr. LONG subsequently said: Mr. President, I have been talking with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and I desire to ask leave to bring up Senate Resolution 158.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana, while I was absent from the Chamber today, called up Senate Resolution 158. Objection was made to its immediate consideration, as I am informed.

Mr. LONG. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And I understand the Senator from Louisiana wishes to call up the resolution now.

Mr. LONG. Yes; I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to the Senator doing so, with the understanding that I shall make a motion to refer the resolution to a committee.

Mr. LONG. I call up Senate Resolution 158, if there is no objection.

There being no objection, the Vice President laid before the Senate the resolution (S.Res. 158) submitted by Mr. LONG on the 30th instant, providing for an investigation of the activities of citizens of Louisiana adverse to HUEY P. LONG, United States Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am not going to object to that motion, because I hope I will be able to get an early report from that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas that the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT OF TEMPORARY CLERKS TO SENATORS

As in legislative session,

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. I ask to have the resolution read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S.Res. 161) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That each Senator is authorized to appoint one additional clerk to serve until the expiration of the present session of the Congress, and to be paid a salary at the rate of $1,800 per annum out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, such comment as I desire to make on this resolution will be very brief.

I assume that I suffer from the same disadvantages which seem to be affecting all other Members of this body now. Every Senator to whom I have talked has told me the same story. It is physically impossible to answer the mail that is now coming in.

I do not care to prolong the discussion. The resolution merely provides that each Member of this body shall have the aid of an extra clerk during the remainder of this session, which may go on for 60 days or possibly longer. It does not provide for any permanent extra aid.

I am not sure whether the resolution should be referred to a committee or not. If not, I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Necessarily the resolution must be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BONE. That is perfectly all right, if it has to be so referred under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so referred.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS

As in legislative session,

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I submit a resolution which I ask to have read and adopted. It is a resolution from the Claims Committee authorizing that committee to hold hearings, and providing for the payment of stenographic expense. It is the ordinary resolution which is passed from year to year, and we need it. It ought to be adopted today, for the reason that we have some hearings set for tomorrow.

There being no objection, the resolution (S.Res. 162) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims or any subcommittee thereof be, and hereby is, authorized during the Seventy-third

Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during sessions or recesses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rule, the resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BYRNES, subsequently, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which Senate Resolution 162 was referred, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I wish to call up Senate Resolution 162, which has been favorably reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The resolution merely authorizes hearings by the Committee on Claims, and allows a stenographer to be employed. I desire its adoption at this time in order that the committee may have a hearing tomorrow. It is the usual form of resolution.

There being no objection, the above resolution (S.Res. 162), submitted today by Mr. BAILEY, was considered and agreed to.

THE TOWN OF NORRIS, TENN.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the New Republic for January 31, 1934, entitled "The T.V.A. Builds a Town", having relation to the town of Norris, Tenn.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New Republic, Jan. 31, 1934]

THE T.V.A. BUILDS A TOWN

The town of Norris, Tenn., will be more than a memorial to the great liberal Senator for whom it is named; it will be the first example in the United States of what genuine, coordinated planning can accomplish. It will be a town in which human intelligence and human technical skill will turn the natural advantages to uses that will enable men and women to build a living, functioning, possibly beautiful community, rather than a realtor's dream of subdivisions or a landlord's dream of rack-rent.

Four miles away through the Cumberland foothills is the Norris Dam, one of the major power units of the Tennessee Valley Authority, and at Norris will be built a new, complete town for those whose work makes it desirable for them to live near the dam. The sole landlord, the sole planner, the sole builder will be the T.V.A. itself. Nor will time, congestion, and economic shifts, the three great destroyers of the model town, be able to strike at Norris. There is no land for sale. Indefinitely the T.V.A. will be the sole planner, landlord, and builder. The land and buildings at Norris will be for rent only, and they will be for rent only to those who will use them—employees whose work leads them to live in Norris. So there will be no artificially encouraged congestion "down town" while the blight of abandonment and decay settles over an outlying section. There will be no arbitrary, eternal lot lines to block new streets or prevent the assemblage of large plots for future public buildings or industrial needs. The T.V.A. is aware that a town is a living thing; it cannot be planned into a state of eternal perfection and left to stand unaltered and unalterable. It lives; time changes its needs, its problems; only unending planning can keep it what its makers intend it to be.

In the meantime, how is the town to be started? What is it to look like? With what sort of lots and houses does the T.V.A. plan to start its child off into life?

Streets have already been graded, lots staked off, and plans drawn for the first unit of 250 houses. Construction of the first block, 50 houses, will start at once, and the entire unit should be completed by the middle of June or the first of July. It has not been decided how many more units will follow, but engineers estimate a maximum population of 5,000 to 6,000, requiring approximately four units.

The standard home will average four rooms, a bath, a laundry, and a large screened porch in the rear. Materials and labor costs will range from $2,100 to $5,000 per building. The rental for a 3-room house with all conveniences, including an electric heating unit, will be less than $20 a month. Larger houses will rent for as high as $45. Each house will be entitled to a 4-acre farm plot at no additional cost. Some of the residents will have individual farms; others will pool their land and till it on a cooperative basis.

The designing of the houses is in charge of Roland A. Wank, New York architect, who in 1930 won the gold medal of the American Institute of Architects for his design for the Grand Street apartments in New York City for the Amalgamated Clothing Workers. Mr. Wank has decided to use no standardized, special style of architecture. Traditional materials are being used for building because they are local and therefore cost less. The emphasis, both outside and in, is on simplicity, so that all the money available can be spent on things that will give value, use, and comfort to the occupants. The houses will have no cornices, moldings, or other ornaments. They will be heated by electricity. This will be possible through the cheap power the T.V.A. will produce at Norris Dam. An electric range, a refrigerator, a water heater, and numerous other electrical appliances will be furnished. Steel casements which will extend to within 4 inches of the ceiling will be used for windows to improve ventilation. Every house will have a large screened porch costing almost as much as a room but almost as useful in this climate.

Showers will take the place of bathtubs because they require less space and are more efficient. Wall board will be used instead of plaster because it is cheaper and can be applied without skilled labor. Skilled labor will be used by the T.V.A., but the hope is to make the type of construction at Norris so easy that a neighboring farmer who wants to build himself a similar house will be able to do so. It is for the same reason that the T.V.A. is experimenting with a fireproof type of construction that would be simpler to build than brick veneer. Every house will have an electric humidification system to reduce the heat bill, for properly humidified air is comfortable at a lower temperature than dry air.

There will be no building line in the town of Norris. Further, the houses will be staggered unevenly. No window of any house will command an unbroken view of its neighbor's kitchen. The details of location for each house will be determined entirely by the topography of its lot. Each lot will be slightly irregular and slightly different in size from the others. The T.V.A. town planners will see to it that there are not in Norris the wretched views almost inseparable from the subdivision type of development. The rear of a house will be as attractive as the front.

In the center of the town there will be a large common to serve as a park and open-air meeting place. A recreation field will be laid out next to the school. At one end of the common will be the town center, which will include an administration building, a hotel, a restaurant, a drug store, a barber shop and beauty parlor, a general store, and a post office. All these will be built and owned by the T.V.A. It has not yet been decided whether the T.V.A. will operate them itself or lease them, but in any event it will not sell them. The Authority will not only build its school, but will operate it as well. Dr. Floyd W. Reeves, T.V.A. personnel director, formerly of the University of Chicago, will be the director. The school will offer grammar, junior-high, and high-school courses.

On the outskirts of the town there will be a well-designed tourist camp, a filling station, and a garage, while surrounding the town will be a protective belt of park to prevent the encroachment of undesirable developments. Residents of Norris will also have the use of a large administration building equipped with an auditorium, game rooms, movie hall, library, canteen, and lounge.

The cost of street improvements, water and sewer systems, grading, landscaping, storm-water drainage, street lighting, public buildings, and cost of planning and overhead expenses, together with interest on investment in construction, will not be added to the cost of the houses. And there is a sound economic reason for this: If the town had not been built it would have been necessary to erect several more dormitories at the construction camp and several individual houses for foremen and engineers. For practically the cost of such temporary buildings the T.V.A. is able to give its town a permanent start in life.

Mr. Wank and his aids do not like the term "model town." They refuse to apply it to Norris. "We cannot make revolutionary improvements any more than we can pull rabbits out of a hat", Mr. Wank said. "Until mass production puts materials of the twentieth century—steel, concrete, aluminum, glass, cork, rubber, resin compositions, etc.—closer within our reach, we are confined to much the same materials as our forefathers used, and they have already made a pretty thorough job of exploring all the possibilities of lumber, brick, stone, and mortar."

But though technical necessity limits the distance that the T.V.A. can go toward changing our whole accepted methods of town and house building, the steps taken at Norris are definitely in the right direction. They could hardly be otherwise. After all, as Mr. Wank remarked, "Private enterprise has made a sorry mess of housing."

JOHN T. MOUTOUX.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada for the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway, signed July 18, 1932.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Couzens	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Ashurst	Cutting	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Davis	King	Russell

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] are detained at home by illness. I desire also to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] is detained by official engagements and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are detained upon official business out of the city.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] are necessarily absent from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, when the debate was concluding yesterday afternoon in the time of the Senator from Wisconsin, a difference of opinion arose on the floor of the Senate respecting the correct quotation of President Roosevelt in his Albany address in July 1932 opening the Democratic campaign. I quote from the stenographic notes of yesterday's late proceedings:

> Mr. VANDENBERG. In the address which the Democratic nominee made to the country over the radio he undertook to read and paraphrase the Democratic national platform. * * * The Democratic nominee, in reading the program and platform to the country, included the precise St. Lawrence plank to which the Senator from Wisconsin is referring.
> Mr. LEWIS. I want to say that my able friend from Michigan has fallen into an error, unconsciously, of course. The speech of the President did not say "the St. Lawrence waterway" but "waterways", and I call attention to the fact that the Democratic platform did not allude to the "St. Lawrence waterway", and thus it could not have authorized him in his speech to construe that platform to endorse other than what it said—"waterways."
> Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall be very glad to put the President's precise words in the RECORD tomorrow.

I rise, Mr. President, to complete that promise, and at this moment I read from the New York Times of July 31, 1932, under the heading "Full Text of Speech of Governor Roosevelt Delivered from Albany, N.Y., July 30, 1932":

> We advocate extension of Federal credit to the States to provide unemployment relief where the diminishing resources of the States make it impossible for them to provide for the needy; expansion of the Federal program of necessary and useful construction affected with a public interest, such as flood control and waterways, including the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes deep waterway.

I submit that the facts thus vindicate my statements upon yesterday. The President specifically identified the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes deep waterway.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I again call the attention of my eminent friend from Michigan to the fact that what he has read has vindicated the statement made by me to the Senate. It is that the President had not authority and could not have had authority as the nominee upon the Democratic platform to have advocated the treaty which is now under discussion. It is evident that the President's remarks had to do with waterways and made reference to the St. Lawrence. I am perfectly willing to agree that Canada shall build her St. Lawrence waterway whenever she pleases; that the St. Lawrence waterway may be built whenever she chooses; but there is not a word in the President's speech which advocates this treaty between the United States and Canada for a St. Lawrence waterway; nor is there a word in the Democratic national platform—and may I be pardoned for saying I had a little something to do with that document; pardon me; I withdraw that—with reference to the pending treaty, but the platform advocates only "waterways."

My friend is right in assuming that the words "St. Lawrence waterway" were used by the President, but I call his attention again to the fact that I have insisted all the time that the President had at no time in that speech advocated the support of the treaty or referred to the treaty in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not intend to discuss with the Senator what happened to the St. Lawrence waterway plank in the Democratic National Convention. I freely concede that it is shrouded in great mystery.

Mr. LEWIS. We regret that the Senator from Michigan was not present in order that he might have given us information.

Mr. VANDENBERG. At least if the Senator from Michigan had he would have undertaken to make it plain what the situation was.

Mr. LONG. We did.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Louisiana indicates that they did. If the Senator from Wisconsin will bear with me, I shall proceed just a step farther into the historical facts to which my friends are alluding to demonstrate otherwise.

It appears that on the evening of July 30, 1932, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] made an address over the radio from Chicago in behalf of the Republican National Committee in which he took the Democratic Convention to task for not having specified in its platform its attitude respecting the St. Lawrence project. The pending treaty had been signed 2 weeks previous. The Senator from Iowa called attention to the fact that the printed platform as released in Washington did not include the reference to the St. Lawrence seaway. The Senator from Illinois is entirely correct in that respect. I have never disputed it. Hence, the mystery to which I referred.

That evening—the same evening—the Democratic Presidential nominee made his Albany address and the only controversy between the Senator from Illinois and myself on yesterday afternoon was solely the question whether or not Governor Roosevelt in that speech identified the St. Lawrence seaway as a part of the platform and as a Democratic pledge. I am submitting this morning the textual fact that he did undertake to read the St. Lawrence identification into his platform.

Immediately after the delivery of that speech and as further demonstration of the historical truth of the thing I am discussing, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] sent a telegram to the Democratic nominee under date of July 31 in which he said:

In your radio address last night while reading what you informed your national audience to be the Democratic platform you made use of the phrase "including the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes deep waterways"—

That is the only present contention I have been making—in what you called the Democratic unemployment plank.

I am constrained to believe that in so doing you have, knowingly or otherwise, committed an amazing deceit upon the American people. It is unfortunate that you should begin your campaign for the Presidency so inauspiciously.

In other words, the Senator from Iowa was indicating at that time that there was an amazing difference of opinion respecting what the Democratic national platform had to say upon this proposition. The only thing I am submitting to the Senate, the only thing which was involved in my controversy with my able friend from Illinois on yesterday afternoon, was that Governor Roosevelt did say in his speech of July 30 that the Democratic commitment was to "flood control and waterways, including the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes deep waterway."

The whole controversy is of no serious moment, because the present attitude of the President of the United States makes it utterly clear what has been and is in his mind in respect to this great undertaking, as further evidenced by the fact that in his message submitting the St. Lawrence Treaty he said:

I request the consideration of ratification by the Senate of the so-called "St. Lawrence Treaty with Canada." Broad national reasons lead me, without hesitation, to advocate the treaty.

Mr. LEWIS. I will conclude, with the usual generosity of the Senator from Wisconsin, by commenting on the fact that the Senator from Michigan says his observation upon the subject is of no moment. I deny that anything the Senator from Michigan should say is of no moment, but I call attention that the particular thing in the moment is that in the whole moment occupied no word of the treaty between this country and Canada was mentioned by the President.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will yield further——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I dislike to take any more time on the question of the platform, but I wish to say that no mention was made in the platform of the Mississippi River as a part of our inland waterway project, nor of the Missouri River, nor of the Ohio River, and yet I doubt if any Senator or any citizen of the United States who has ever studied the question doubts that when we refer to the development of waterways we have in mind those rivers.

It is general knowledge without mentioning it specifically. It is equally general knowledge that from the beginning of our Government—yes; even before the existence of our Government—the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River were recognized as a part of the water transportation of the territory at that time embraced within the British possessions and colonies and now under the sovereignty of the United States.

Following it down from that time until the present time the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River have been recognized as one of the water transportation systems of the United States. Part of these Lakes are our exclusive property. Other parts of the Lakes are held in common, we might say, between Canada and the United States. Part of the St. Lawrence River is a boundary and sovereignty is divided and held in common. But even as to that part of the river exclusively within the sovereignty of Great Britain and Canada, since the very beginning of our Government all treaties have recognized that the whole system is an essential waterway to both countries and it has been made free to both of them from the beginning.

It was not necessary in the platform to mention any one of the particular waterways. The platform did not do it. It was not even essential for the President of the United States to mention particularly the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway because, as I said, from the beginning of our Government we have had treaty after treaty recognizing that system of water as a waterway of the United States in common with Great Britain. There was no necessity whatever for mentioning it. The President mentioned it very probably because, as a legislator in the Legislature in the State of New York many years ago, he had taken an interest in that waterway, and because President Wilson initiated steps for the purpose of making it economically available to us to the highest capacity. It was recognized then; it was recognized again under President Harding; it was recognized under President Coolidge; and it was recognized under President Hoover as one of our waterways. In fact, it has been recognized as one of the waterways of the United States upon which to transport commerce just as long as the Mississippi River has been so recognized.

It seems to me that this effort to show that there was not some specific mention in the platform of one waterway is entirely beside the question and is an attempted argument that has no weight.

Tuesday, January 30, 1934

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I had intended to address the Senate on the subject of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Treaty this morning when it met, but, in view of the fact that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] rose to a question of personal privilege, of course, it was necessary for me to yield to him.

Mr. President, the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project, provided by the treaty, will permanently benefit the producers and consumers of every section of the United States. It will inevitably stimulate and increase our domestic commerce in the home market, comprising 80 percent of all our water-borne tonnage. It will thus directly contribute to the shipping and trade of every existing American seaport on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts.

I propose, therefore, to discuss the pending treaty in terms of its effect not upon any single State or section but upon the United States as a whole.

President Roosevelt has expressed the correct principle upon which this and every other project should be tested in a message which has inspired confidence and support among the people, not only in the Great Lakes region but throughout the Union.

In his message the President said:

Broad national reasons lead me, without hesitation, to advocate the treaty. There are two main considerations, navigation and power.

The President completely disposes of the misrepresentations and false arguments which have been advanced in the discussion of this project. He appeals from fear to a confidence based on authenticated facts. He subordinates local, sectional greed to the general welfare and the interest of the whole Nation.

The President continues in his message:

I am sending you herewith a summary of data prepared at my request by governmental agencies. This summary, in its relation to the economic aspects of the seaway, shows from the broad national point of view, first, that commerce and transportation will be greatly benefited and, secondly, local fears of economic harm to special localities or to special interests are grossly exaggerated. It is, I believe, a historic fact that every great improvement directed to better commercial communications, whether in the case of railroads into new territory, or the deepening of great rivers, or the building of canals, or even the cutting of the Isthmus of Panama, have all been subjected to opposition on the part of local interests which conjure up imaginary fears and fail to realize that improved transportation results in increased commerce benefiting directly or indirectly all sections.

For example, I am convinced that the building of the St. Lawrence seaway will not injure the railroads or throw their employees out of work; that it will not in any way interfere with the proper use of the Mississippi River or the Missouri River for navigation.

The President continues:

I am satisfied that the treaty contains adequate provision for the needs of the Chicago drainage district and for navigation between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi River. A special report from the Chief of Engineers of the War Department covers this subject.

Concluding his message, the President states:

I have not stressed the fact that the starting of this great work will put thousands of unemployed to work. I have preferred to stress the great future advantages to our country and especially the fact that all of us should view this treaty in the light of the benefits which it confers on the people of the United States as a whole.

Every conclusion the President states in his message is buttressed by official data in the summary which accompanies it. It is a document that does credit to the administration and brings immeasurably nearer to realization the greatest economic and engineering project undertaken on this continent since the construction of the Panama Canal.

When the existing obstacles to navigation on the connecting rivers and channels from the Great Lakes to the sea are removed under the terms of the pending treaty and when ocean-going vessels dock at the harbors of 30 American cities on the Great Lakes, with 80 percent of their cargoes originating at the ports of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, the resulting benefits to the whole Nation will be due in large part to the decisive action of President Roosevelt.

The treaty before us was signed at Washington on July 18, 1932, nearly 18 months ago. The Committee on Foreign Relations conducted an exhaustive investigation which continued from November 1932 until February 1933.

Every phase of the project was carefully considered. Representatives of public utilities, railroads, and other interested parties were heard. The economic advantages to the whole Nation and the feasibility of the engineering plans embodied in the treaty were thoroughly established by the testimony of scores of disinterested witnesses.

Sixty-nine witnesses were heard orally, and written statements and briefs were filed by numerous individuals and organizations, a great majority of the whole number being favorable to the immediate completion of the project. No adverse witness was denied a hearing. No line of inquiry was proposed by any member of the Senate or of the committee which was not pursued to a conclusion. At the end of the hearing, upon the motion of the late Senator Thomas J. Walsh, of Montana, the treaty was favorably reported to the Senate by a vote of 9 to 2, with an accompanying report from the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the chairman of the committee.

VICIOUS PROPAGANDA AGAINST THE TREATY

From the time this treaty was under negotiation, when it became evident that the United States and Canada might reach an equitable agreement after years of study and cooperation, the project became the subject of an attack which has continued unabated for the last 2 years.

A vicious propaganda directed by special interests has been circulated against the treaty from the day it was submitted to the Senate. Estimates of costs and maintenance have been padded. Statistics have been twisted and distorted. The simplest facts of geography pertaining to this project have been falsified in order to obstruct the completion of the project and to intimidate the President and the Senate from carrying out the pledge for ratification of the treaty made by the candidates of both major political parties in the last campaign.

I have examined the pamphlets most widely circulated in this campaign of propaganda and find that they contain scores of direct misstatements of fact, every one of them contradicted by the public record. Upon that false foundation were built up the "local fears of economic harm to special localities or to special interests" to which the President refers in his message as "grossly exaggerated."

Until the President sent his message to the Senate, with accompanying data from the agencies of government concerned with this project, we were asked to accept propaganda as fact.

This vast accumulation of misinformation and untruth has now been thrown into the rubbish heap. The time has gone by when the Senate of the United States can be asked to accept padded cost estimates and briefs prepared by public utility and railroad lobbyists in preference to official figures from such agencies as the Corps of Engineers and the Federal Power Commission, authenticated by the President of the United States.

At the last session of the Senate, the Senator from Louisiant [Mr. LONG] and the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] led the filibuster which prevented consideration of the treaty. They insisted over and over again that no adequate economic study had been made to determine the effect of the project upon our domestic commerce.

The President has submitted the results of an exhaustive investigation for discussion by the Senate, and it can no longer be maintained that further study of this project is needed.

OFFICIAL DATA NOW AVAILABLE

The President sent his message urging the ratification of the treaty and submitted the official estimates of the Corps of Engineers of the War Department covering every item of the cost of both the power and navigation projects covered by the treaty. The President called upon the highest engineering authority available under the Government to obtain these estimates. He adopted them and sent them to the Senate for consideration in connection with the treaty.

Not one Senator opposed to the treaty has pointed to an error in the estimates. Not one figure submitted by the President in his summary of the official report has been challenged. The whole effort, in fact, has been to disregard these estimates, official in character, as though they had never been made; to drag in other figures and estimates made years before the project was agreed upon and the treaty was signed, drawn from unofficial and private sources. The evident purpose of this effort is to avoid the real issue of cost presented by the President of the United States and to confuse Senators who approach the question with an open mind.

Senators continue to quote the estimates of Col. Hugh Cooper made 14 years ago for a plan of development of the St. Lawrence River which had absolutely nothing to do with the project provided by the pending treaty. Colonel Cooper himself, in a telegram to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] specifically repudiated the use of his estimates as applied to the project under consideration in this debate. Yet, in order to confuse the minds of Senators, the opponents of this treaty persist, in the teeth of Colonel Cooper's repudiation, to use those figures.

The opponents of the treaty ask us to consider the figures in a book published 5 or 6 years ago by Dr. Moulton, an economist without shipping, engineering, or power experience of any kind. The figures used in that book have absolutely nothing to do with the project specifically provided by this treaty.

So far as the development of St. Lawrence power is concerned, Dr. Moulton frankly states in his book that he has relied upon figures furnished him by Sanderson & Porter, an engineering firm which for years has been one of the chief consultants under retainer by the private power and public-utility companies of the East.

Dr. Moulton's book was written and published years before the pending treaty was drawn up and signed at Washington by representatives of Canada and the United States. Yet Senators are asked to consider figures that have their origin in such sources and to disregard official estimates of the Corps of Engineers, an official agency which has served this Government in war and peace and served it faithfully since the establishment of the United States Military Academy at West Point in 1802.

I wish Senators to refer to page 424 of the current issue of the Congressional Directory, which gives the official duties of the various agencies of the Federal Government. I quote:

The Chief of Engineers is charged under the direction of the War Department with control in technical matters over all the Corps of Engineers. The duties of the Corps of Engineers comprise reconnoitering and surveying for military purposes; the preparation, reproduction, and distribution of military maps of the United States and its possessions, and in field operations of maps of the theater of operations; selection and acquisition of sites and preparation of plans and estimates for military defenses; construction and repair of fortifications and their accessories, including submarine mine systems; planning and supervising defensive or offensive works of troops in the field; military demolitions; military mining; and the construction, operation, and maintenance of all railways, utilities, ferries, canal boats, or other means of inland water transportation.

Civil duties committed to the Chief of Engineers, under the direction of the Secretary of War, are principally as follows: The execution of work ordered by Congress for the improvement of rivers and harbors and other navigable waters of the United States; and investigation and supervision, in cooperation with the Federal Power Commission of power projects affecting navigable waters of the United States.

The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors is a permanent body created by the River and Harbor Act of June 13, 1902. To it are referred for consideration and recommendation all reports upon examinations and surveys provided for by Congress and all projects or changes in projects for works of river and harbor improvements upon which report is desired by the Chief of Engineers United States Army. In its investigations the Board gives consideration to all engineering, commercial, navigation, and economic questions involved in determining the advisability of undertaking such improvements at the expense of the United States.

CORPS OF ENGINEERS RESPONSIBLE FOR RIVER AND HARBOR WORK

Mr. President, no river or harbor project has been undertaken in this country in more than 30 years except on the basis of estimates made by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors under the direction of the Chief of Engineers.

If the estimates made by the Corps of Engineers are to be disregarded when we come to deal with the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River, then the estimates from the same source should be disregarded when we come to deal with the improvement of New York harbor, the other ports on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, and the improvement of the Mississippi River system, and appropriations for improvement upon other rivers in the country.

We cannot disregard such estimates and resort to the twisted and partial figures of railroad and utility propaganda, without checking the development of this country and introducing chaos into the plans for improving the navigable waters of the United States.

Does any Senator here contend that the officers of the United States Army, who are at present at the head of the Corps of Engineers, have failed to bring to the consideration of this project devotion to national interests, impartial minds, and familiarity with the subject?

The present Chief of Engineers of the United States Army is Maj. Gen. Edward Murphy Markham, appointed by President Roosevelt October 17, 1933. General Markham has had more experience in dealing with navigation, questions of diversion and control, and development of power on the Great Lakes and their connecting rivers and channels than all the Members of the Senate combined.

A complete statement of the record of General Markham is as follows:

General Markham was born in Troy, N.Y., July 6, 1877. He was appointed a cadet to the Military Academy from New York in June 1895, graduated fifth in a class of 72 in February 1899, and was immediately appointed additional second lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers, United States Army.

His first duty as an engineer officer was as an assistant at St. Augustine, Fla.

He became second lieutenant, Corps of Engineers, September 29, 1899; was ordered to duty at the engineer school at Willets Point, N.Y.; and was appointed first lieutenant, Corps of Engineers, February 2, 1901, later being assigned to duty with Second Battalion of Engineers during the period at Willets Point and in the Philippine Islands. Returning to the United States, he was assigned as adjutant at Washington Barracks, D.C., and as assistant to Captain Sewell, Corps of Engineers, in charge of the reconstruction of Washington Barracks, D.C. He later commanded Company H, Second Battalion of Engineers, at Washington Barracks and in Cuba. He was promoted to captain October 15, 1905, and, returning from Cuba, was assigned to duty in Washington, D.C., in August 1907, and remained in this city as assistant engineer commissioner until August 1912. His promotion to major came February 27, 1912, and from the summer of 1912 until ordered to duty at the United States Military Academy, West Point, N.Y., in 1917, he was on duty as district engineer at Memphis, Tenn.

His duty during the war as colonel of Engineers, National Army, from August 5, 1917, was at Camp Dix, N.J., where he organized and commanded the Three hundred and third Engineers. He took this regiment to France and remained in command of it until relieved for assignment to General Headquarters, A.E.F., as deputy director of light railways and roads. He was afterward transferred to Coblenz, Germany, as chief engineer, Army of Occupation, and he returned to the United States and went at once to Detroit, Mich., where early in the summer of 1919 he had been assigned as district engineer.

Since October 1929 he has been division engineer of the Great Lakes division with office at Cleveland, Ohio, having supervision over the Buffalo, Detroit, second Chicago, Milwaukee, Duluth, and Lake Survey Districts. During this period the following work on channels and harbors was commenced or provided for: Duluth-Superior Harbor, channels in St. Marys River above and below the Soo Locks, the St. Lawrence between its head and Ogdensburg, Livingstone Channel in Detroit River, the lower Saginaw River, channel across Lake St. Clair, Toledo Harbor, Cleveland Harbor, Indiana Harbor, and Conneaut Harbor.

At the same time, as a member of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors since early in 1932, he has taken an active part in reviewing the major proposed improvements of rivers and harbors for navigation and flood control over the entire country.

Since the war his assignments have been: District engineer, Detroit, Mich., July 15, 1919; district engineer, Lake Survey, July 12, 1921; commanding officer, Fort Humphreys, Va., June 4, 1925; and division engineer, Great Lakes division, Cleveland, Ohio, October 26, 1929.

He was promoted to colonel, Corps of Engineers, May 11, 1921. Important boards of which he has been a member are:

Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors.

St. Lawrence Waterway.

Waterway from Chicago to the Mississippi River, Calumet River, Little Calumet River, Lake Calumet, and the Sag Channel, Ill., July 29, 1930.

The Joint Board of Engineers on St. Lawrence River Waterway. Appointed June 6, 1932.

International Board of Control to govern the maintenance and operation of the power-development works already built and authorized to be built in St. Marys River between Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., and Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario.

Board appointed to make preliminary examination of the Miami and Erie Canal, Ohio, including a branch canal connecting the Miami and Erie Canal with Lake Michigan, with a view to securing a channel.

Board appointed to consider and report upon plans for the construction of a county highway bridge across the Ohio River at McKees Rocks, Allegheny County, Pa.

Board for the purpose of making a survey of Calumet River, Little Calumet River, Lake Calumet, and the Sag Channel, Ill., with a view to providing a connection with, and terminal transfer harbors for, the waterway from Chicago to the Mississippi River, authorized by the River and Harbor Act approved July 3, 1930.

Educational Advisory Board.

Board of Surveys and Maps.

General Pillsbury's record is as follows:

Pillsbury, George Biglow, Army engineer; born Lowell, Mass., December 19, 1876; student Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 1894–96; graduate, United States Military Academy, 1900; commissioned second lieutenant, Engineer Corps, United States, June 13, 1900, and advanced through grades to lieutenant colonel, February 6, 1920; engineer, Alaska Railroad Commission, 1904–8; associate professor mathematics, United States Military Academy, 1908–12; district engineer, New London, Conn., district, 1912–16; Los Angeles, Calif., district, 1916–17; commander, One hundred and fifteenth Engineers, 1917–18; One hundred and second Engineers, 1918; Corps Engineers, Second Corps, American Expeditionary Forces, 1918–19; member, Joint Board of Engineers, St. Lawrence waterway, 1923–26; District engineer, Philadelphia district, 1928–30; assistant to Chief of Engineers, United States, with rank of brigadier general for period of 4 years from June 27, 1930; awarded D.S.M. (U.S.).

Mr. President, it is to men like General Markham and General Pillsbury to whom President Roosevelt turned to obtain the estimates as to the cost of this project, the capacity of the locks and channels, and the desirability to the United States of the execution of the works provided by the treaty, when he sent his message of January 10 to the Senate.

The President gave a general summary of these estimates and the reports from other governmental agencies when he submitted his message.

On January 19 the President made public at the White House a detailed summary, confined exclusively to the report from the Corps of Engineers.

FACTS IN SUPPORT OF ECONOMIC BENEFITS OF SEAWAY NOW ESTABLISHED

Notwithstanding the attempts which are being made to avoid the issue, in spite of the confusion over the physical aspects of this project and its cost of construction and maintenance, I submit that the following facts have been clearly established and cannot be successfully challenged or overthrown. I quote from the official summary of the report of the Corps of Engineers, as follows:

The net cost to the United States of completing the seaway, under the treaty, is estimated at $182,726,250. This assumes that the New York power project will carry $89,726,750 as its share of the cost.

The annual cost of the seaway to the United States, including interest at 4 percent, amortization of the entire cost of the project in 50 years, operation and maintenance, is estimated at $9,300,000. This amounts to an annual cost of 7.4 cents per capita of the United States and 23.2 cents per capita of the area which will be directly served by the seaway.

The reports show that less than 10 percent of the total mileage of the waterway requires improvement to enable ocean-going cargo vessels to navigate the entire distance of approximately 2,300 miles from tidewater to Chicago or Duluth. It is already improved to a depth of 21 feet through the lake channels and consists of 134 miles of deep open water and 49 miles of 14-foot canals in the St. Lawrence above Montréal.

The proposed improvement provides for a minimum depth of 27 feet from all Great Lakes ports to open ocean. The major portion of the work, provided for in the treaty between the United States and Canada, will be done in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River, where two dams will transform the rapids into deep pools. Two short canals with locks will carry navigation around the dams.

Analysis of prospective use of the seaway shows that the ocean-going-freight cargo vessels of the chief maritime nations of the world, with a tonnage of 2,000 tons or over, number 6,707, with a total tonnage of 31,000,000. Of this total, 5,457, with a combined tonnage of 22,000,000, have a draft, fully loaded, of 26 feet or less. This means that more than 80 percent of the world's freight cargo vessels and 70 percent of the cargo-vessel tonnage can utilize the proposed seaway.

Possible export and import commerce over the proposed St. Lawrence Waterway, based on 1929 conditions, is estimated at 25,000,000 tons. This is determined on the basis of a survey of the country's entire exports and imports, allocated on a regional basis. Certain arbitrary assumptions in the interest of conservatism reduced the final estimate of probable tonnage to 13,000,000.

For determining the potential savings due to the use of the waterway, movements of certain commodities considered typical were utilized. Thus, in the case of kaolin, comparison was made as to the cost of movement from Liverpool via the St. Lawrence and Cleveland to Cincinnati. In this manner the movements of 5 import commodities and 6 export commodities were traced. These include grain products, meats and animal fats, manufactured iron, chemicals, automobiles, agricultural implements, and copper. Potential imports via the seaway include sugar, rubber and rubber substitutes, coffee, bananas, kaolin, vegetable oil, manganese, and pyrites.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEBERT in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As an interesting demonstration of the fact that the computations to which the able Senator from Wisconsin refers are no mere fiction, that they have a substantial reality in fact, may I call the Senator's attention to the fact that even with the limited export water-borne traffic, which is possible today from the city of Detroit through the 14-foot channel, last year 54 cargo ships cleared from Detroit for foreign ports carrying meat products, corn sirup, corn meal, and soda products in England; coal-tar pitch to Spain, Holland, Belgium, and France; meat products to Germany; and automobiles to England, Spain, Holland, South Africa, Australia, Belgium, Denmark, Germany, France, and Sweden, all directly from the Detroit docks.

I submit that the Senator is wholly justified in the conclusions he is submitting to the Senate on the basis of the experience we are now undergoing by way of water-borne traffic out of Detroit under the great handicap still existing until the seaway is opened.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I appreciate the Senator's interruption, because it reinforces the point I was making.

I quote further from the official summary of the report of the Corps of Engineers:

In estimating the savings on other commodities the average saving per ton on the typical commodities was used. It was realized that the navigation season on the St. Lawrence would be about 8 months per year and a reduction of one third in the potential tonnage was arbitrarily made for this reason.

The figures, as reduced, were found to indicate an export tonnage of 7,471,500 tons, with an indicated saving of $44,810,923. Similarly import tonnage was estimated at 5,742,333 tons and the savings on the movement at $34,082,207. * * *

Comparison with the important ship canals of the world, including the Manchester, Kiel, Suez, Panama Canals, and the North Sea Canal to Amsterdam, in terms of length of restricted navigation, depth, bottom width, and locks, shows that the proposed seaway is completely practical for navigation by ocean cargo vessels. The completed seaway from Duluth to the Atlantic Ocean will provide a waterway in which vessels may move with unrestricted speed over approximately 97 percent of the total distance.

ANSWER TO THE MINORITY REPORT

The junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] has submitted a minority report upon this subject. The Senator states in his report that in reaching his conclusions as to the effect of the project upon the commerce of the United States he has considered no official data published since the Department of Commerce report of 1926 and the St. Lawrence Commission report of 1927.

Since the minority report is chiefly directed against these traffic-tonnage estimates of 1926 and 1927, it is evident the Senator's report itself is completely out of date. Every important point, and every question raised in the minority report submitted by the junior Senator from New York, has been covered in official data brought up to date in the summary submitted to the Senate with the President's message.

When the Senator has had an opportunity to examine the data submitted by the President, I know he will give it that fair, earnest, and open-minded consideration which has characterized his whole service in this body. In the end I feel sure he will square his position on this question with the best, most complete, and latest-available facts, unmoved by any consideration other than the welfare of his State and the entire Nation.

In my opinion, the Senator has performed a public service by repudiating and rejecting from his minority report the misstatements of fact and false arguments which have been circulated most widely against the pending treaty.

The minority report, for instance, omits any reference to the absurd claim so often made upon this floor that the treaty presents a scheme to build up the port of Montreal at the expense of New York City, Boston, Baltimore, and our other Atlantic and Gulf ports.

The truth is that Montreal is today the head of navigation on the St. Lawrence River. She has enjoyed tremendous growth under existing conditions, and her chamber of commerce and port authorities have denounced the pending treaty as inimical to her interests. Montreal is situated below the rapids on the St. Lawrence River, which today cut off Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, Duluth-Superior, and other great American ports from direct access to the sea.

According to an official survey of the ports of Canada recently made by the Dominion Government, Montreal has an assured future as a seaport even when she loses her favored position as the head of navigation on the St. Lawrence. It is obvious, however, that the great American cities on the Lakes will remain at a heavy disadvantage until the project provided by this treaty is completed and the obstacles to navigation above Montreal are removed.

Another significant omission of the minority report of the junior Senator from New York is the argument so often advanced by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] that the Chicago Sanitary District should be permitted to increase its illegal diversion of water from Lake Michigan beyond the limits imposed by the Supreme Court of the United States and the pending treaty.

The Senator from New York refers in the Minority report to article 7 of the treaty, by which it is provided that Canadian vessels shall be permitted equal navigation rights with American vessels on Lake Michigan. Canada has that right today under the treaty of 1909. That lake would be of little value to the United States unless it formed a part of the Great Lakes system and its connecting channels, comprising the greatest body of fresh water on the face of the globe.

In exchange for this parity, American vessels under the treaty are conceded equal rights with Canadian vessels in perpetuity to the free navigation and use of the Welland Canal, built wholly at Canadian expense, at a cost of $128,000,000, and in 1,000 miles of the St. Lawrence River below Montreal, already improved at Canadian expense to a depth of 30 feet.

The minority report of the Senator from New York cited article 8 as "a further limitation upon the rights of the United States in Lake Michigan", but it is to be noted that the Senator does not advocate any increase in the diversion at Chicago. It would be surprising, indeed, if the Senator from New York, who has declared with such emphasis his stanch advocacy of "the power project upon which the treaty is based", should join with those who are insisting upon nullification of the Supreme Court decree by amendment or reservation of the treaty.

By resolution of the Legislature of New York with the approval of her Governor and attorney general, the State of New York joined the States of Wisconsin, Minnesota, Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania in the protest against the excessive diversion by the sanitary district of Chicago which ultimately resulted in the Supreme Court decree.

A resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of New York on February 2, 1925, provided:

> Whereas the withdrawal of 1,000 cubic feet per second of water from Lake Michigan is adequate for the needs of navigation in constructing a waterway from Lake Michigan to ultimately connect with the Mississippi River; and the withdrawal of 10,000 cubic feet per second of water from Lake Michigan at Chicago is damaging navigation interests on the Great Lakes to the extent of approximately $3,000,000 annually in addition to the damage done to other interests:
> Resolved (if the assembly concurs), That the Legislature of the State of New York respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States not to advance to passage the aforesaid bill nor any other measure which would authorize the withdrawal of any quantity of water from Lake Michigan to the Chicago Sanitary Canal in excess of 1,000 cubic feet per second.

Upon a moment's consideration it will be recognized that every cubic second-foot of water diverted at Chicago diminishes the water power that can be generated on the St. Lawrence by precisely the same extent. If the 5,000 cubic second-feet sought by opponents of the treaty were diverted at Chicago, it would diminish by 50,000 primary horsepower the hydroelectricity that can be generated on the St. Lawrence, a block of power conservatively valued at $15,000,000. As a friend of the power project, the junior Senator from New York could not be expected to sanction this denial of the undoubted legal rights of his own State.

The Senator, in fact, supports the President in viewing this question from a broad national point of view. He rejects all appeals to national envy and prejudice directed against a friendly neighboring nation. He despises to implant the "grossly exaggerated" "local fears of economic harm to special localities or to special interests" to which the President referred in his message. I differ with many of the Senator's estimates of cost, based upon inadequate data entirely superseded by official estimates which are now available. While I take direct issue with his conclusions, yet it must be conceded that the Senator from New York is correct in his definition of the central question involved in this treaty.

The Senator states in his minority report that—

> The single issue that everyone wants to face is: Will the cost of the St. Lawrence project to the people of the United States as a whole be more than the foreseeable returns to these people?

Immediately after the minority report was filed and before it appeared in print, this proper and practical question received a complete answer from the President of the United States. The President sent here the careful, authoritative estimates made by the Corps of Engineers of the War Department bearing directly on the Senator's question.

As I have already shown, the President's report shows a transportation saving to the producer and consumer of $79,000,000 a year in a study confined to foreign commerce, which comprises only one fifth of our total water-borne shipping, the balance being entirely domestic in its origin.

I read from the summary of the report of the Corps of Engineers:

> A consideration of the producers and consumers' market which will be opened up to deep-water transportation by the development of the proposed seaway, with a comparison of the land and ocean rates, will indicate in some small measure the benefits to domestic commerce which will be developed through the proposed improvement.
> Typical savings in such domestic shipments, assuming return cargo available, were $5.55 to $12.64 per ton on lumber from Grays Harbor, Wash., to Detroit, Mich.; $9.33 per ton on class 5 commodities from Philadelphia to Chicago; $84.95 per ton on automobiles from Detroit to Los Angeles.

These are by no means all the benefits the President has asked the Senate to consider in connection with this project. The general economic development of all sections of the country, the new industries and the rise in values resulting from both the seaway and power project, the stimulus given our domestic trade by the creation of a new seacoast 3,500 miles in length, and the enormous saving to consumers of electricity resulting from the development and distribution of the cheapest electric current available in North America, are also clearly shown in the summary submitted by the President.

Take the cost of the entire project under the treaty which is given in the Senator's minority report. Disregarding the carefully worked out estimates of the Corps of Engineers, the report estimates the cost at $573,136,000, or more than double the official estimates of the War Department.

This figure, which is utterly discredited in the interdepartmental report sent to the Senate by the President, is arrived at by arbitrarily assuming that the cost will exceed the estimate by 20 percent. This assumption is made in the teeth of the testimony of General Markham, the Chief of Engineers, and General Pillsbury, the Assistant Chief of Engineers, that work on the connecting channels of the Great Lakes has been going forward for more than a year at an actual cost of about 50 cents on the dollar of the original estimates.

After adding 20 percent to the estimates of the Engineers, the minority report includes with the cost of this project an arbitrary estimate of $25,000,000 for each of the principal harbors on the Great Lakes: Duluth-Superior, Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, Toledo, Cleveland, Buffalo, and Sandusky. This accounts for $200,000,000, or about 40 percent of the cost of this project as estimated in the Senator's minority report. It completely ignores the fact that many of the great ports on the Great Lakes, like the city of New York on the Atlantic, maintain their own port authorities and that much of the expense of developing the harbors will be borne by the local communities.

The estimate of $200,000,000 for the improvement of eight harbors on the Great Lakes, as presented in the minority report, is directly challenged by the testimony of General Markham, Chief of Engineers, in the hearings on this treaty.

General Markham testified before the Foreign Relations Committee that, allowing for the usual local contribution to such port developments, eight important harbors on the Great Lakes could be developed to a depth of 25 feet at a total Federal cost of $7,500,000.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have an excerpt from the testimony of General Markham inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The testimony referred to is as follows:

Senator WALSH of Montana. Now, something was said here about the necessity of large expenditures for the improvement of the Lakes harbors to make them open to entry by ocean-going vessels drawing 25 feet. What have you to say about that?

Colonel MARKHAM. We have never been called upon to report the cost of ocean-going traffic into the Lakes harbors, but as a matter of small interest and provision we have taken eight harbors and adopted our own contemplations of what, in fact, will be the manner of their upbuilding toward ocean trade, and have arrived at the conclusion that in all likelihood the Federal expenditure to get ocean-going ships drawing 25 feet to an ocean terminal in each of these eight harbors will cost less than $7,500,000.

Senator VANDENBERG. Will you name those eight harbors?

Colonel MARKHAM. Duluth, Chicago, Calumet, Toledo, Cleveland, Buffalo, and Milwaukee.

Senator WALSH of Montana. And Detroit?

Colonel MARKHAM. I probably should have included Detroit, but there is practically no improvement to be done at Detroit. * * *

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Following the testimony of General Markham I desire to insert in the RECORD a copy of a letter under date of January 24, 1934, sent to me by General Markham at my request, containing a further statement in connection with this particular phase of the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, January 24, 1934.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr.,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR LA FOLLETTE: I am advised that in view of the extravagant statements made as to the cost of improving the harbors on the Great Lakes to accommodate shipping through the proposed St. Lawrence deep waterway, you desire reliable figures on the probable cost of such improvement.

The harbors on the Great Lakes are already developed to accommodate a commerce vastly exceeding in volume the commerce which may be anticipated through the seaway. Ships used on the present commerce of the Lakes exceed in size those which will use the waterway, but are of less draft. Until 1930 Lake harbors were developed to provide depths generally of from 21 to 22 feet to accommodate vessels of 20-foot draft. In 1930 a comprehensive project was adopted by Congress for deepening the connecting channels between the Lakes to accommodate downbound ore-carrying vessels of 24-foot draft. The River and Harbor Act authorizing this improvement directed the submission of detailed plans and estimates of the cost of correspondingly improving the harbors on the Lakes. These plans and estimates have been prepared and submitted to Congress, a large part of the work of improvement at the principal harbors has been included in the Public Works program, and has been contracted for at prices in close agreement with the estimates.

On the table below there is shown for five of the largest harbors the actual cost of improvement heretofore accomplished for 20-foot navigation and the detailed estimated cost of further improving these harbors to accommodate vessels of 24-foot draft.

	Actual cost of improvement to June 30, 1930, to provide channels generally 21 to 22 feet deep to accommodate vessels of 20-foot draft with breakwaters, entrances, and other protective works	Cost, based on detailed estimates of improving the harbor generally from 25- to 26-foot depth, to accommodate vessels of 24-foot draft, including incidental improvement of breakwaters, entrances, and other protective works
Duluth-Superior	$7,159,634.38	$1,319,000
Buffalo	4,779,627.62	1,863,000
Cleveland	6,733,967.99	600,000
Toledo	2,892,102.36	1,255,000
Calumet (South Chicago)	2,803,261.10	4,540,000
Total	24,368,593.45	9,577,000

The list does not include Milwaukee Harbor, where a capacious and well-protected outer harbor of 21-foot depth has been constructed at a total cost of $5,808,387.96. Since this harbor is not an ore port, detailed estimates have not been prepared for its further improvement to provide 24-foot draft. Detroit Harbor is not included, since the water front is on natural deep water in Detroit River.

In order that these harbors may accommodate ocean-going vessels passing through the St. Lawrence seaway it is necessary only to further deepen to 27 feet the channels to a suitable location for an ocean terminal or terminals in the present protected harbor areas. Preliminary but conservative estimates based on available and appropriate locations for such terminals show that a total expenditure of $7,500,000 or less will provide the necessary harbor improvements at seven of these largest lake harbors.

Sincerely yours,

E. M. MARKHAM,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, perhaps I have devoted too much time to that contention of the minority report, because it seems utterly absurd to me. It would have been just as absurd at the time the Panama Canal was under construction to have figured up all of the improvements for all time to come in the harbors of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific ports and to have added the lump sum thus ascertained to the total cost of building the Panama Canal.

But let us accept for the sake of argument the estimates submitted in the minority report. Let us assume that the cost of the power project, the seaway, and the improvement of the principal harbors on the Great Lakes would amount to $573,136,000. Nevertheless the President has shown in the interdepartmental report which is now before us that the saving of $79,000,000 in transportation costs alone will pay the entire cost of this project and the improvement of the harbors in less than 10 years of normal business activity. This takes no account whatever of the enormous benefits which will accrue to the people of the State of New York and the northeastern region generally in the public development of the cheapest water power available in the United States.

We have already seen how the public power development at Muscle Shoals has forced the private utility companies from Birmingham, Ala., to St. Louis, Mo., to reduce their extortionate rates, with a saving of millions of dollars a year to consumers of electricity. If St. Lawrence power is developed, it is inevitable that the rates charged domestic consumers, which are now about four times the rates charged across the St. Lawrence River in Ontario, will be sharply reduced not only in the State of New York but throughout Pennsylvania and New England.

In passing, Mr. President, I desire to point out one example of the effect of the power development. The summary indicates that the cost of electricity delivered to the switchboard in the city of New York from the St. Lawrence project with a 60-percent load factor to be one-half mill per kilowatt-hour and 4.8125 mills with an 80-percent load factor.

In view of this situation we can all agree with the statement made by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] at the outset of his minority report:

I am completely in favor of the public development of cheap and abundant water power; and I want to emphasize at the outset that I do not oppose the power project upon which the treaty is based.

It only needs to be pointed out, Mr. President, that it is impossible to secure this development of power without a treaty; therefore, if this development of power is to take place, the treaty must be ratified.

The argument has been advanced on the floor and in the cloakrooms of the Senate that this treaty should not be ratified because the Senators from New York are opposed to the development. The junior Senator [Mr. WAGNER] has made it entirely clear in his minority report that he strongly favors the only portion of the project under this treaty which directly concerns his own State.

He stands with President Roosevelt in urging the construction of the works and the development of the latent water power in his own State, which promises such enormous benefit to the people of the Northeast. The only difference between the Senator and the President is that the President likewise favors the navigation development, which does not concern the State of New York alone but, as the President has shown, will directly benefit the land-locked States of the interior of the country, with a population of 45,000,000, and ultimately stimulate and promote the development, commerce, and shipping of every seaport and State bordering on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts.

The President bases his advocacy of the navigation project upon up-to-date estimates, carefully sifted and analyzed by four separate governmental agencies. The Senator from New York lays before the Senate a minority report, frankly stating that he has had no up-to-date data before him and, accordingly, has had to rely upon estimates made in 1926 and 1927, 7 or 8 years ago.

I know that the Senator will give the up-to-date information submitted to the Senate by the President his best consideration.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE AND SUMMARY IS COMPLETE ANSWER TO OBJECTIONS TO NAVIGATION PROJECT

I submit, Mr. President, that no fair-minded person can read the President's message and the summary that accompanies it without conceding that he has given a complete answer to every objection raised against the navigation features of the treaty. The President has given an answer based upon the authority of the Corps of Engineers of the War Department and upon his long study and entire familiarity with this subject. The answer he gives is conclusive on the benefits of the seaway. It is devastating to the absurd propaganda that has been circulated against the treaty by the great banking houses connected with the public utility and railroad corporations of the eastern section of the United States. At sometime, Mr. President, before this debate shall have been concluded I expect to make a demonstration of their control and of their direct, selfish interest in defeating the treaty.

In view of the circumstances stated, it is not surprising to find the opponents of the treaty virtually abandoning the field, refusing to fight this question out on its merits on the issue of actual transportation savings and national benefits.

In the opening address of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] we have witnessed an attempt to take refuge in the fantastic argument that the seaway, which the Senator claims will be inadequate to float an ocean vessel, is the result of a foreign plot to open a highway into the heart of the United States for an invasion by British battleships.

The Senator resorted to an equally absurd argument when he attempted to show that the power development had no place under the treaty and had been included in the treaty project only because of the cunning of the negotiators for the Dominion of Canada.

This line of argument is disproven and discredited by every word of testimony in the record of the Committee on Foreign Relations and every official document of the United States and Canada that has ever been printed on this subject. Likewise, it belies the whole public record of Franklin D. Roosevelt as Governor of the State of New York and impeaches his good faith and intelligence as President of the United States.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. I was just going to ask the Senator a question. We had a convention in Chicago at which the President was nominated, and at that convention there was a report in favor of the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty, but it was stricken out on the floor of the convention, because a majority of the party were not in favor of it. In other words, it came to the floor of the convention, but was not adopted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, that is not my understanding of the matter——

Mr. LONG. Perhaps I am a little wrong about that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My understanding is—and I think such a statement has been made in this debate—that an affidavit was made by the chairman of the resolutions committee that an endorsement of the St. Lawrence seaway project had been included in the report of the resolutions committee, and that it was left out when the report was presented, due to an oversight.

Mr. LONG. That is a mistake.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not ready to concede that is a mistake.

Mr. LONG. It was recalled to my mind, and I very vividly recollect how it was left out. It was intentionally and designedly left out as everybody, I think, probably will agree. I inquire of the Senator what chairman was it who it is stated made such an affidavit as he has indicated?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If my recollection is correct——

Mr. DUFFY and Mr. LEWIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield first to my colleague.

Mr. DUFFY. Former Senator Hitchcock, the chairman of the resolutions committee, has executed an affidavit to the effect that the question was passed on by the subcommittee and that they intended to read the provision to the convention, but that it was left out purely by oversight.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will have to let this question go over until some later time. I do not think it is particularly important in view of the fact——

Mr. LONG. If the chairman left it out, he did so for a good reason, because it would have been hail Columbia if he had read it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That also is a statement, the accuracy of which I cannot concede. In any case, however, it does not seem very important to me.

Mr. LONG. Did the Republican Party put such a provision in its platform?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It certainly did.

Mr. LEWIS. I may say that the Democratic platform used the word "waterways."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois when in the chair is very meticulous about forcing every other Senator to address the Chair before he interrupts.

Mr. LEWIS. I was correcting my friend from Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Illinois, but I cannot listen to two Senators when they talk at the same time, and I am anxious to have the record straight. I do not believe that the point is very important inasmuch as the candidate of the Democratic Party made a statement early in the campaign unequivocally pledging himself and his administration, if elected, to the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In the address which the Democratic nominee made to the country over the radio, he undertook to read and paraphrase the Democratic national platform. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that it is more or less inconsequential, but the fact is that the Democratic nominee, in reading the program and platform to the country, included the precise St. Lawrence plank to which the Senator from Wisconsin is referring.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment; and I promise I will not disturb him further until his speech shall have been concluded.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yielded to the Senator about 3 hours this morning, but I am glad to yield to him again.

Mr. LONG. A member of the resolutions committee came to my room and told me they were leaving the St. Lawrence waterway out. I had forgotten it until I was reminded of it. I remember it very vividly; and it was left out purposely and not brought to the floor of the convention.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I want to say that my able friend from Michigan has fallen into an error, unconsciously, of course. The speech of the President did not say "the St. Lawrence waterway", but "waterways", and I call attention to the fact that the Democratic platform did not allude to the "St. Lawrence waterway", and thus it could not have authorized him in his speech to construe that platform to endorse other than what it said—"waterways."

Mr. DUFFY and Mr. VANDENBERG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield, first, to the Senator from Michigan, and then I shall yield to my colleague.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall be very glad to put the President's precise words in the RECORD tomorrow. I think there is no doubt about where the President stands.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. DUFFY. In this connection I wish to say that I discussed this matter with the President about 2 weeks ago, trying to recall whether my recollection was correct, and the President at that time assured me that it was the St. Lawrence waterway that he referred to in his radio speech, and it was he who called my attention to the affidavit which had been executed by former Senator Hitchcock.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. DIETERICH. I do not think we ought to labor under any mistaken notion as to the pledge in the party platform. There is not any question that the Republican Party platform directly pledged the party to the St. Lawrence project, though the treaty had not then been completed. It is also a matter of record that the Democratic Party pledged to "waterways", including the St. Lawrence and Great Lakes waters. I want to differentiate as to that. That was not a pronouncement for this particular treaty; it was generally for a St. Lawrence waterway project and not for this particular treaty, but the project was included in the word "waterways", which the Democratic platform endorsed generally, as my colleague has well said.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Just to clear up this platform matter, I have the Democratic platform before me, and I will read it to the Senate. It states:

> We advocate the extension of Federal credit to the States to provide unemployment relief wherever the diminishing resources of the States make it impossible for them to provide for the needy; expansion of the Federal program of necessary and useful construction affected with a public interest such as adequate flood control and waterways.

I regret to say that it does not specifically mention the Mississippi River, and I hope the failure to mention the Mississippi River does not mean that the platform is against the development of the Mississippi River. It does not mention any particular harbor, and I hope it will not be construed that the platform is against the improvement of any of the harbors of the country.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Since there is so much controversy about the Democratic platform and there seems to be more than one, I should like to know whether the Democratic Party circulated one platform around Chicago and a different platform around New York?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no, Mr. President, we never do anything like that. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. It looks now as though you have been caught right in the act of doing that very thing.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But the Senator from Nebraska is occasionally cross-eyed. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin, I wish to correct my statement. The platform I read was a copy published at the time the convention was held, which contained the language indicated by me. I see from the platform read by the Senator from Nevada that that language was stricken out.

I did not interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin when he was talking about the diversion of water at Chicago because I did not want to interrupt his speech at that time, but I do not agree with him, and I do not think he has a correct understanding of the litigation and its effect. I want to serve notice on the Senator that I will undertake to enlighten him on the subject when he shall have concluded.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will also try to enlighten the Senator before I conclude.

THE PRESIDENT HAS STUDIED ALL QUESTIONS INVOLVED

Mr. President, I had just referred to the statement made by the Senator from Illinois in his opening address concerning the power aspects of this treaty.

The Senator from Illinois gave it as his opinion that the President had fallen into error in his conclusions in respect to the treaty. The fact is that the President has given the subject more consideration over a longer period of time than any Member of this body. For 5 years he has been grappling with this question of the development of the St. Lawrence River. He followed every step of the negotiations between the United States and Canada. He came to the conclusion, based upon repeated inspections of the site of this project, and upon study of all phases of the question, for 4 years as Governor of New York and during his incumbency as President, that the simultaneous development of the river for both power and navigation would result in a tremendous saving of public money and confer lasting benefits upon the people of New York and the Nation.

The Senator from Illinois, in my judgment, has only disclosed his own unfamiliarity with the subject matter of the treaty, and the narrow interests of the Chicago Sanitary District from which he views this great project in the speech he has made upon the floor of the Senate belittling the intelligence of the President.

Mr. President, let the opponents of this treaty disprove the estimates of the Corps of Engineers. Let them point out the errors in the economic survey that has been made on transportation savings. Let them explain why ocean-going vessels cannot navigate a channel 27 feet in depth from the Atlantic to Chicago and Duluth, with 97 percent of the total distance free from canals, locks, or restrictions of any kind. I hear Senators who are opposed to this treaty constantly referring to this project or seaway as a "canal." For 97 percent of the distance from Duluth to tidewater it is no more a canal than is the Atlantic Ocean itself.

The opponents of this treaty refuse to discuss these questions and insist upon raising irrelevant questions, designed to inflame public sentiment against Canada and to arouse local fears and prejudices, because the President has completely demolished the legitimate grounds of opposition to this project.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it seems to me relevant that we should briefly review the history of diversion of water from Lake Michigan at Chicago.

The city of Chicago had been dumping its sewage into Lake Michigan. Despite the efforts of the city to build its domestic water intakes farther and farther out into the lake, the deaths from typhoid fever began in the late 1880's and 1890's to show an alarming increase. During the World's Fair of 1893 the death rate from typhoid fever rose to something like 140 per hundred thousand people. This alarming situation developed a demand for some relief from these insanitary conditions and gave tremendous impetus to the proposal to create a sanitary canal to dispose of this sewage in some manner so that it might not menace the health of the citizens of the city of Chicago.

Although it is now regarded, I believe, by impartial sanitary engineers as a colossal engineering blunder, the Chicago Drainage Canal was pushed very rapidly until it was open for use in 1900. In order to flush this sewage through the drainage canal it was necessary to change the natural course of the Chicago River, which theretofore had flowed into the Great Lakes system, and to divert a large amount of water at Chicago from the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Watershed. This diversion reached an excessive amount of water; and in 1907 the United States Government instituted a suit in the Federal District Court in Chicago to restrain the Sanitary District of Chicago from diverting more than 4,167 cubic second-feet of water from Lake Michigan.

The suit was pending in the district court for upward of 6 years, when finally a decision was rendered sustaining the contention of the Federal Government, in which the district judge held that any diversion in excess of 4,167 cubic second-feet was in violation of law. This decision was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States; and the States of Wisconsin, Minnesota, Ohio, and Michigan joined with the Government in the hearing on the appeal. The sanitary district, through its lawyers in the Supreme Court, urged that the previous action of Secretaries of War had affirmed and authorized this diversion.

In the decision of the Supreme Court on this case it completely rejected this contention on the part of the sanitary district of Chicago, and refused to recognize that there were in the actions of the Secretaries of War or of Congress any authorizations for this excessive diversion as it was then being made by the sanitary district. After reciting the statutes and the various permits issued by the various Secretaries of War, the Court said in part—and I quote from Two Hundred and Sixty-sixth United States Reports, 405, at page 430:

> On January 8, 1913, Mr. Secretary [of War] Stimson carefully reviewed the situation, including the obvious fact that so large a withdrawal would lower the levels of the Lakes, and the overwhelming evidence that it would affect navigation, and held that he was not warranted in excepting the appellant [the sanitary district] from the prohibition of Congress on the ground of even pressing sanitary needs. It appears to us that the attempt to found a defense upon the foregoing licenses is too futile to need reply.

In a later case the States of Wisconsin, Ohio, Minnesota, and Pennsylvania joined in asking that any diversion in excess of 1,000 cubic second-feet should be restrained. The State of Michigan brought a separate action, in which it was later joined by the State of New York, asking for relief against all diversion. Now, it is perfectly clear, although it may not perhaps be pertinent to this particular argument, that the reason why the States of Wisconsin, Ohio, Minnesota, and Pennsylvania did not ask for a complete cutting off of the diversion at Chicago was that they were in entire sympathy with the construction of the Illinois waterway, but were convinced upon the overwhelming weight of the evidence and testimony of the Army engineers that 1,000 cubic second-feet was more than that necessary to provide water for navigation upon this waterway.

It is my understanding and, I think, that of the attorneys general who have represented the Lake States in this long litigation, that the Supreme Court has never passed upon the question of the right of Congress to divert water from one natural watershed to another, even in the interests of navigation. I think I am correct in stating that it is the unanimous opinion of these attorneys general, who have given years of study to this question, that Congress has no such right.

I wish to make it clear that I concede at the outset that the Supreme Court has not passed in these cases upon the right of Congress, through the exercise of plenary power, to divert water from one natural watershed to another. I state, however, as a fact, that it is the contention of these attorneys general that Congress has no such right.

In this connection, however, I think there should be pointed out the physical situation involved in this question of diversion.

It has been contended by some of the opponents of this treaty who appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee that the source of the Des Plaines River was Lake Michigan. This is entirely disproved by all the testimony that has been taken in these cases. The physical fact is undoubtedly that the Des Plaines River is on the west side of the Continental Divide, and certainly that in all times of written history it has never been on the east side of the Continental Divide. All of the testimony indicates that in order that water from Lake Michigan should flow into the Des Plaines River, Lake Michigan would have to rise between 8 and 10 feet above its normal level. The overwhelming weight of testimony in these cases demonstrates beyond possible refutation that certainly during any historic time there has never been any such rise in the levels of Lake Michigan. The Supreme Court of the United States, I contend, has definitely settled the question of any right to a diversion based upon any previous flow from Lake Michigan into the Mississippi Basin against this contention.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. May I be pardoned to say to my able friend, whose speech indicates his splendid industry, that his position that the Supreme Court of the United States has never affirmed the right of taking water from one shed transverse to another is defeated, I deplore to add, knowing his industry—he has been misdirected—in the late case in the Supreme Court of the United States of Connecticut v. Massachusetts (282 U.S., 660–674), which I must concede so thoroughly varies from previous rulings that it was very natural for both eminent counsel and the able Senator to have drawn deductions from the previous rulings. I call attention to the last case, Two Hundred and Eighty-second United States Reports, pages 660–674, which justifies the doctrine of the right of Congress or any other legitimate source to divert interstate waters from one watershed to another.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is the contention, Mr. President, may I say—and this is what I intended to state—that the Supreme Court in these cases never passed upon the right of Congress to divert water from one watershed to another. I think perhaps the Senator misunderstood my statement.

The State of Wisconsin filed the first of these bills on July 14, 1922. The Wisconsin bill was amended on October 5, 1925, and the States of Minnesota, Ohio, and Pennsylvania became coplaintiffs. The amended bill sought an injunction restraining the State of Illinois and the sanitary district of Chicago from causing any water to be taken from the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence watershed in such manner as permanently to divert it from that watershed. On April 8, 1926, the State of Michigan filed a separate bill for the same relief. On October 8, 1926, the State of New York filed a separate bill for the same relief. Subsequently the three suits were consolidated for the purpose of hearing.

Pursuant to a hearing upon the first report of the special master to whom the causes had been referred, the Supreme Court, in a decision rendered on January 14, 1929, established the facts and declared the law governing the rights of the parties. I quote from the decision, which is to be found in Two Hundred and Seventy-eighth United States Reports, 367, at page 420:

> In increasing the diversion from 4,167 cubic feet a second to 8,500 the sanitary district defied the authority of the National Government resting in the Secretary of War. And insofar as the prior diversion was not for the purposes of maintaining navigation in the Chicago River, it was without any legal basis, because made for an inadmissible purpose. It therefore is the duty of this Court by an appropriate decree to compel the reduction of the diversion to a point where it rests on a legal basis, and thus to restore the navigable capacity of Lake Michigan to its proper level. The sanitary district authorities, relying on the argument with reference to the health of its people, have much too long delayed the needed substitution of suitable sewage plants as a means of avoiding the diversion in the future.

In October 1929, in referring to this decision above quoted, Mr. Justice Holmes declared—and I quote from Two Hundred and Eighty-first United States Reports, 179, at page 196:

> * * * The facts were set forth in detail and the law governing the parties was established by the decision reported in Two hundred and Seventy-eighth United States, page 367. It was decided that the defendant State and its creature, the sanitary district, were reducing the level of the Great Lakes, were inflicting great losses upon the complainants, and were violating their rights by diverting from Lake Michigan 8,500 or more cubic feet per second into the Chicago Drainage Canal for the purpose of diluting and carrying away the sewage of Chicago. The diversion of the water for that purpose was held illegal, but the restoration of the just rights of the complainants was made gradual rather than immediate in order to avoid, so far as might be, the possible pestilence and ruin with which the defendants have done much to confront themselves. * * *

As recently as May 22, 1933, the Supreme Court, in a unanimous decision, rendered by Chief Justice Hughes, reaffirms the foregoing in forceful language. I quote from the preliminary print, volume 289, United States, no. 3, 395, at pages 401 and 402:

In this suit the State of Illinois has defended from the beginning upon the ground that diversion was essential with reference not only to the needs of sanitation but also for a continuous waterway from the lake to the Gulf (Wisconsin v. Illinois, supra, pp. 388, 396). But the Court found this contention unavailing and that the existing diversion was unlawful. The Court found no basis for the argument that the diversion had been authorized by the Congress (id., pp. 416–420).

After a full examination of the facts, and considering the questions presented in all their aspects, the Court deemed it to be its duty "by an appropriate decree to compel the reduction of the diversion to a point where it rests on a legal basis and thus to restore the navigable capacity of Lake Michigan to its normal level" (id., p. 420). The "restoration of the just rights of the complainants was made gradual rather than immediate in order to avoid so far as might be possible pestilence and ruin with which the defendants have done much to confront themselves" (Wisconsin v. Illinois, 281 U.S. 179, 196). The final decree fixed the time and amount of the reduction of the diversion with this object in view (id.). That decree in terms bound the State of Illinois, no less than its creature, the sanitary district. In delivering the opinion of the Court Mr. Justice Holmes summed up the matter by saying: "It already has been decided that the defendants are doing a wrong to the complainants and that they must stop it. They must find out a way at their peril. We have only to consider what is possible if the State of Illinois devotes all its powers to dealing with an exigency to the magnitude of which it seems not yet to have fully awaked. It can base no defenses upon difficulties that it has itself created. If its constitution stands in the way of prompt action, it must amend it or yield to an authority that is paramount to the State" (id., p. 197 (Wisconsin v. Illinois, 289 U.S. 395, 401–402).

The attitude of the Court and the situation with regard to the future is emphasized in the following statement by the Court in its enlargement of the decree of April 21, 1930, Two Hundred and Eighty-first United States Reports, page 695. Chief Justice Hughes says—and I quote from the same decision, pages 410 and 411:

The finding of the master that it is still possible to complete the sewage treatment works within the time fixed by the decree for the ultimate limit of the diversion finds support in the statements now submitted by the defendants. On the hearing before the master the sanitary district took the position that "ample time remains for this construction, assuming that funds will be available", and "that a finding that the district will not obtain the necessary funds or will not construct these works by December 31, 1938, is premature and unwarranted." And in its present argument beforer this Court the sanitary district states:

"No delay has occurred which will affect the ultimate completion of the works before the end of 1938, except the delay caused by lack of money. The evidence does not disclose that there need be any apprehension on the part of this Court as to the diligence it may expect from the sanitary district. On the contrary, the testimony to which we have referred indicates that this Court may anticipate that the sanitary district will act with all possible speed in the performance of work necessary to effect compliance with the decree."

The question, then, comes down to the procuring of the money necessary to effect the prompt completion of the sewage treatment works and the complementary facilities. To provide the needed money is the special responsibility of the State of Illinois. For the present halting of its work the sanitary district is not responsible. It appears to be virtually at the end of its resources. The master states that, due to its financial situation, the sanitary district cannot go forward in any adequate manner with either contracts or construction. We find that the master's conclusion, that there is no way by which the decree can be performed under tolerable conditions "unless the State of Illinois meets its responsibility and provides the money", is abundantly supported by the record.

That responsibility the State should meet. Despite existing economic difficulties, the State has adequate resources, and we find it impossible to conclude that the State cannot devise appropriate and adequate financial measures to enable it to afford suitable protection to its people to the end that its obligation to its sister States, as adjudged by this court, shall be properly discharged.

We do not undertake to prescribe the particular measures to be taken or to specify the works and facilities to be provided. But in view of the delay that has occurred and the importance of prompt action, and in order that there may be no ground for misapprehension as to the import of the decree or the duty of the defendant State, we think that complainant States are entitled to have the decree enlarged by the addition of the following provision:

That the State of Illinois is hereby required to take all necessary steps, including whatever authorizations or requirements, or provisions for the raising, appropriation, and application of moneys, may be needed in order to cause and secure the completion of adequate sewage treatment or sewage disposal plants and sewers, together with controlling works to prevent reversals of the Chicago River if such works are necessary, and all other incidental facilities, for the disposition of the sewage of the area embraced within the sanitary district of Chicago so as to prerclude any ground of objection on the part of the State or of any of its municipalities to the reduction of the diversion of the waters of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system or watershed to the extent, and at the times and in the manner provided in this decree.

DECISIONS OF SUPREME COURT HAVE DETERMINED RIGHTS OF LAKE STATES

These decisions of the Supreme Court, bringing the matter right down to the present time, constitute clearly a conclusive and final determination of the rights of the lake States and their citizens, and indeed of all citizens of the United States, to have this diversion limited as ordered by the Supreme Court of the United States in its decree. This limits diversion to 1,500 cubic second-feet plus the domestic pumpage, which now amounts to approximately 1,700 cubic second-feet, a total of 3,200 cubic second-feet, most generous to the State of Illinois and the sanitary district of Chicago, and which provides at least three times the amount of water necessary for navigation or lockage purposes as repeatedly testified by the Chief Engineers of the War Department.

A status so well established as between the States of the Union and its citizens can very properly be respected in our international dealings with a friendly nation which has a corresponding and joint interest in the water in question.

In considering the question of diversion it must be borne in mind that the States which joined in this litigation based their entire contention for the curtailment of this excessive diversion from Lake Michigan upon the ground that it excessively lowered the levels of the Lakes and affected the tremendous traffic upon the Great Lakes system. Perhaps at this point it would be well to emphasize and to remind Senators of the enormous importance of the Great Lakes in relation to the water-borne commerce of the United States. From 1923 to 1932 the Great Lakes ports did 41 percent of the total water-borne commerce of the United States, including both foreign and domestic commerce. This is a larger percentage than the commerce originating from the ports on the Atlantic or the ports on the Pacific or the ports on the Gulf. If the comparison is made exclusively upon water-borne domestic commerce, the Great Lakes ports during this period handled 51 percent of the commerce of the United States.

The interest of Canada in objecting to the Chicago diversion is equal to that of the United States, and has been consistently maintained in its diplomatic correspondence with this Nation. It should be kept in mind that for all practical purposes Lake Michigan and Lake Huron constitute one lake because of the enormous expanse of water connecting the two bodies, and the levels of these lakes, as shown by the long record thereof, are always the same. It should also be noted that any reduction in the levels of the two lakes not alone affects adversely the commerce on the lower lakes and connecting waters but also vitally affects the commerce which must pass from these lower lakes through Lake Huron into or out of Lake Superior.

This excessive diversion of water from Lake Michigan also damaged the harbors on the Great Lakes not only by lowering the channel depths but also by lowering the water so as to expose above the natural water line the piling under the foundations of buildings near the shore lines of the lakes and in harbors, requiring repair work running into the millions of dollars. The Supreme Court in its decisions found repeatedly that an excessive diversion at Chicago lowered the levels of the Lakes, particularly Lakes Huron and Michigan, by approximately 6 inches, and also caused a lowering of the levels in the Lakes below Lake Huron and in the St. Lawrence River, and that it does an actual injury to the large commerce on the Great Lakes involving a direct loss to shipping interests in the reduction of the amount of tonnage carried of more than $3,000,000 a year. In this connection I wish to quote from the resolution adopted by the Wisconsin Legislature:

Whereas the Great Lakes constitutes the greatest seaway in the world carrying at the present time tonnage equal to one fourth of all the railroad tonnage of the United States at a cost of less than one fifth that of railroad freight rates, and the diversion by the sanitary district of Chicago has already increased lake freights by not less than $3,000,000 annually and has damaged lake harbors and other works fully $12,000,000.

At the time the Chicago diversion was excepted from the treaty of 1909 with Canada, the whole question with regard to the Chicago diversion was in an unsettled state, and the exception was very properly made, pending decision within the United States of the controversy with regard to this diversion. That controversy has now been settled, so far as the United States is concerned, by the final decision of the United States Supreme Court. This decision definitely settles the matter against all the contentions of the State of Illinois and the sanitary district of Chicago in favor of the diversion, and in favor of the proprietary rights of the lake States and of the citizens of the United States to have the lake levels maintained. These proprietary rights so sustained in favor of our own citizens are equally important to the citizens and the provinces of the Dominion of Canada. The proposed treaty, therefore, very properly provides for the same protection to their rights as has been provided heretofore and is provided by this treaty with respect to any other diversions from the boundary waters between the United States and Canada.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CUTTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Wisconsin is speaking of the decision affecting the sanitary district of Chicago, but I believe he overlooks the fact that the decision does not affect the right of this country to use the waters of Lake Michigan for inland waterways, such as the Mississippi River, for instance. That decision does not settle anything. The treaty, of course, is supposed to be based upon what Chicago can take out of Lake Michigan.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not agree, Mr. President, with the contention of the Senator from Louisiana in that regard. There has been a constant effort, as the decisions, portions of which I have quoted, will show, on the part of the sanitary district to justify the diversion of water upon the basis of the need of it for the Gulf-to-the-Lakes waterway for navigation purposes.

Furthermore, the States lower down the river attempted to intervene in this matter and to have the decree of the Supreme Court modified. They filed their brief on January 12, 1933. It bears the following title:

Application of the States of Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas, intervening defendants, for modification of decree under the provisions of paragraphs 6 and 7 thereof and for enlargement of pending reference to report in connection with such application.

The brief bears the names of attorneys general or representatives of attorneys general for the States of Kentucky, Mississippi, Louisiana, Missouri, Tennessee, and Arkansas.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator from Wisconsin further yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In just a moment.

Mr. LONG. That, however, is only a brief. It is not a pleading.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; this is a petition to modify the decree, and, if the Senator will be patient, I desire to quote from it briefly. In the first place the States in question base their contention and ask for the right to intervene and have the decree enlarged upon an act of Congress authorizing the Illinois waterway, which is fully set forth in the decree. It is the act of 1930 entitled:

An act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

This act contains, among other provisions, the following:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following works of improvement are hereby adopted and authorized, to be prosecuted under the direction of the Secretary of War and supervision of the Chief of Engineers, in accordance with the plans recommended in the reports hereinafter designated.

Then the petition proceeds to quote those sections dealing with the Illinois River, as follows:

Illinois River, Ill., in accordance with the report of the Chief of Engineers, submitted in Senate Document No. 126, Seventy-first Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in his report in said document, but the said project shall be so constructed as to require the smallest flow of water with which said project can be practically accomplished in the development of a commercially useful waterway: Provided, That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for this project a sum not to exceed $7,500,000: Provided further, That the water authorized at Lockport, Ill., by the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered April 21, 1930, and reported in volume 281, United States Reports, in Class Nos. 7, 11, and 12, original—October term, 1929, of Wisconsin and others against Illinois and others, and Michigan against Illinois and others, and New York against Illinois and others, according to the opinion of the Court in the cases reported as Wisconsin against Illinois, in volume 281, United States, page 179, is hereby authorized to be used for the navigation of said waterway: Provided further, That as soon as practicable after the Illinois waterway shall have been completed in accordance with this act, the Secretary of War shall cause a study of the amount of water that will be required as an annual average flow to meet the needs of a commercially useful waterway as defined in said Senate document, and shall, on or before January 31, 1938, report to the Congress the results of such study with his recommendations as to the minimum amount of such flow that will be required annually to meet the needs of such waterway and that will not substantially injure the existing navigation on the Great Lakes to the end that Congress may take such action as it may deem advisable.

After quoting those sections, I continue to quote from the petition:

Applicants—

That is, these States I have already mentioned—

allege that in and by the act aforesaid Congress gave direct authority for a waterway from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi and thereby removed any legal bar to due and proper consideration of the rights of applicants, the intervening Mississippi River States, and thereby made relevant for consideration the findings of the original report of the special master first appointed by the court in these cases.

In other words, Mr. President, the intervening Mississippi River States based their contention for a right to refer the whole question of the water needed for this waterway to the special master on the following grounds, and I quote further from the petition, on page 8:

The applicants, therefore, allege that no consideration of these questions can be given without the question as to the ultimate diversion becoming involved, and therefore it becomes necessary and appropriate in considering said questions that the decree be modified to comply with the said act of Congress aforesaid, or at least consideration to said act of Congress be properly and appropriately given by the said special master.

Wherefore your applicants, the States of Louisiana, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas, and Mississippi, pray that this Court enter an order enlarging the reference heretofore made to the Honorable Edward F. McClennen, as special master, to determine what modification of the decree of April 21, 1930—is required to make the same conform to the action of Congress taken by the said Rivers and Harbors Act of 1930 above set forth, with right to the parties, including the applicants herein, to appear before said master, introduce any relative testimony in connection with the allegations hereof, and with directions to the said special master to report such facts and make such recommendations as equity and justice may require, and for such other and further relief in the premises as shall seem just and meet.

Which is the decree which fixed the limitation upon diversion—

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield in just a moment.

In Two Hundred and Eighty-eight United States Reports, at page 587, Senators who are interested will find that this motion submitted January 12, 1933, from which I have just been quoting, was acted on by the court, when the court held—

The motion to amend the decree herein is denied.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, now will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield in just a moment more. I want also, since the Senator has raised this point, to state that there has been a constant attempt not only upon the part of the sanitary district and the State of Illinois but also, as I have shown, on the part of other States, to intervene and to raise the broad question of diversion for navigation purposes. In Two Hundred and Seventy-eight United States Reports, at page 388, in summing up the argument for defendant the decision says—and this is the argument made on the part of the sanitary district of the State of Illinois—

(a) It makes possible an adequate water outlet of the Mississippi Basin to the Great Lakes.

And also, on page 396, in summing up the argument for the defendant, the decision states as follows:

The diversion is not for the purpose of sanitation only. It is also for the purposes of navigation and, even if we examine its purpose of sanitation alone, we shall find that authorization thereof for that purpose was and is a regulation necessary and reasonably related to the protection of both navigation and interstate commerce on land.

Mr. President, not only did the Supreme Court deny the petition of the Mississippi River States which intervened to secure a reference to the master and a modification of the decree to include questions of diversion for navigation purposes on the Mississippi to the Gulf waterway, I contend that not only the decision, but the voluminous record and testimony taken before the masters in this long litigation, demonstrate beyond refutation that there has been a determined effort on the part of the sanitary district and the State of Illinois and the other States to justify diversion on the need of it for navigation purposes. The Court has not only denied that petition, as I have just demonstrated, but that in a unanimous decision rendered recently by Chief Justice Hughes, it is stated—and I quote again from Two Hundred and Eighty-nine United States Reports, page 401:

In this suit the State of Illinois has defended from the beginning upon the ground that the diversion was essential with reference not only to the needs of sanitation, but also for a continuous waterway from the Lake to the Gulf (Wisconsin v. Illinois, supra, pp. 388–396). But the Court found this contention unavailing and that the existing diversion was unlawful.

Furthermore, he disposes of this contention raised in the case from which I have just been quoting in the following language:

The Court found no basis for the argument that diversion had been authorized by the Congress.

POWER ISSUE BEHIND DIVERSION AT CHICAGO

Mr. President, no one can get a full understanding of all the issues which lie behind this long controversy between the sanitary district and the State of Illinois and her sister States bordering on the Great Lakes, and involving the lake diversion at Chicago without taking into consideration the fact that the sanitary district has in the past derived large sums of money from the development of the hydroelectric power made possible only by excessive diversion. For a number of years the district obtained a revenue of upwards of $1,000,000 annually from this excessive diversion through the development of water power.

If it was deemed appropriate, Mr. President, I could go into that matter further, but I do not think that even the Senators from Illinois will controvert the fact that power was an issue in this whole question. I could demonstrate from the record, if necessary, that excessive diversion occurred at Chicago in correspondence with the peak load of electricity and that the very time during the day when navigation was at its lowest on the Chicago River harbor and elsewhere.

PRACTICAL ASPECTS OF DIVERSION

There are certain practical aspects of the question of diversion of water from Lake Michigan by the Chicago Sanitary District which I wish to present at this time.

I have already pointed out that every cubic second-foot of water diverted by the Chicago Sanitary District from Lake Michigan diminishes the amount of water power that can be developed by the public power project in the State of New York. Any increase in that diversion at Chicago will cripple the public power project in New York, reduce the amount of cheap electricity available to the consumer, and increase the unit cost of electricity which President Roosevelt, while Governor, insured should be preserved and developed for the benefit of the consuming public.

Article VIII of the treaty permits the withdrawal from Lake Michigan of 1,500 cubic second-feet plus about 1,700 cubic second-feet for pumpage—that is, for drinking, sanitary, and other domestic purposes. The total withdrawal permitted under the decree of the United States Supreme Court and article VIII of the treaty amounts to an average of about 3,200 cubic second-feet. President Roosevelt, upon authority of the Corps of Engineers has stated in his message:

I am convinced that the building of the St. Lawrence seaway * * * will not in any way interfere with the proper use of the Mississippi River or the Missouri River for navigation. * * * I am satisfied that the treaty contains adequate provision for the needs of the Chicago Drainage District for navigation between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi River.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I was out of the Chamber when the Senator finished reading the authorities. The Court, of course——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It makes it a little difficult for me to attempt to argue with the Senator on that point when he goes out of the Chamber while I am discussing the subject.

Mr. LONG. I went out only for a second. The authorities, however, which the Senator read, simply mean that the Court declined to entertain the petition of the States intervening in the suit between Chicago and the sanitary district as to the use of the waters of Lake Michigan. The Court could have very well declined to entertain the petition for the reason that it was not a proceeding to decide that question, but, even though it had decided the case on its merits, Lake Michigan is an international lake and is owned by the United States, and therefore, there is no way in the world that the Congress, without this treaty, could be forbidden to do whatever it wanted with Lake Michigan.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not concede the Senator's contention in that regard, and the attorneys general for the Lakes States that have conducted this litigation through all these years do not concede it. I stated frankly at the beginning of my argument that I conceded that in the decisions relating to these cases the Supreme Court had not passed upon the right of Congress to exercise its plenary power to divert water from the Great Lakes watershed to the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway for the purpose of navigation, but I do contend, and I reiterate, that there has constantly been an effort in all these cases upon the part of the sanitary district and the State of Illinois to justify this diversion upon grounds of navigation and its necessity for the Illinois waterway and for the Gulf-to-the-Lakes waterway.

I contend further—and I have already cited the decisions of the Court to support my contention—that the Supreme Court has refused to consider those contentions, and has dismissed them, and, in addition to that, it dismissed the petition filed by the so-called "Mississippi River States" asking for the right to have the reference to the master modified in the last case to include this question.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator permit another question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I will permit a question.

Mr. LONG. I wonder if we could not amend this treaty so as to give the Senator's State and other States the flood water in the spring? Since they want all the water during the time it can be used for navigation, why can we not just amend the treaty and give them the right to construct reservoirs up there and take the flood waters?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Before this debate shall have been concluded, there will be developed the enormous sums of money, of which the lake States have willingly paid their share, to provide flood control upon the Mississippi River and its tributaries. Furthermore, an enormous sum of money has already been allocated under the Public Works Act for these projects, and taxes, in part, will be levied upon the Great Lakes States to carry out that work.

I want to say to the Senator from Louisiana that I will challenge him to find any record in this body more consistently in favor of assisting the States of the lower Mississippi and its tributaries and securing flood control than my own. As a matter of fact, I fought side by side with the former Senator from Missouri, Mr. Hawes, when the whole question of flood control was before the Commerce Committee at that time. I contend that the same consideration must be given, as a matter of justice, to the rights of the Lakes States and to the enormous economic advantages to which they are entitled by nature through the preservation and development of this great waterway system.

Furthermore, I am contending that the State of Illinois, the Chicago Sanitary District, and the Mississippi River States sought to plead the cause of excessive diversion on the ground it was needed for navigation. The Court has definitely rejected their argument and contentions that diversion in excess of 1,500 cubic second-feet and 1,700 cubic second-feet for domestic pumpage allowed by the decree is not adequate to provide for a waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf!

Mr. LONG. I wish to say that I am mindful of the fact that the Senator did very noble work in our flood-control efforts, and I know the Senator went even beyond what our own Senators from Louisiana did, and I thank him for that. However, we are willing to help the Great Lakes States in every way in the world. Why not go along and take the Missouri River, which will be far more helpful to the States of the West than anything that can be done through the St. Lawrence waterway?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not concede that.

Mr. LONG. We have never asked to spend money in Mexico, and we have never asked to spend money in Nicaragua. We have asked to spend money in the United States to take care of the waters of the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will show, before the debate is concluded, although not in this particular address, that more money has been granted for flood control under the Public Works Act to be paid 100 percent out of the Treasury of the United States to control flood waters upon the Mississippi River system and its tributaries than it will cost the United States Treasury under the pending treaty to develop the St. Lawrence waterway. This recent allotment of funds is in addition to the hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars that have already been spent by the Federal Government for flood control and navigation on the Mississippi system.

I say again that the Great Lakes States have been perfectly willing to bear their share of the taxes to provide for this enormous expenditure for flood control; and for the same reasons of national benefit we have the right to ask for a fair consideration in the development of the natural economic resources which God in His wisdom gave to the people who live in the midcontinent area.

TREATY PROVIDES ADEQUATE DIVERSION OF WATER FOR NAVIGATION

If it is true, as the President states upon the highest authority available to the Executive and to the Senate, that article VIII of this treaty provides ample water for navigation purposes on the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers, then the withdrawal of water beyond the limit fixed by the Supreme Court is wholly unnecessary. It will admittedly injure other American States bordering on the Great Lakes. It will reduce the amount of water available for power to public projects, not only in the State of New York but in the Province of Ontario. It will confer benefits upon only one interest—the Morgan-controlled private power companies of the northeastern United States which fear the competition of the public project provided for in this treaty and which will gain an advantage if the water power is reduced in volume, and its unit cost increased.

I submit that this whole question of diversion is not merely an international issue between the United States and Canada but an issue between the Chicago Sanitary District and other States of this Union whose rights are equal to those of the State of Illinois and the Sanitary District.

Let Senators examine a map of the United States. There are 15 States which border directly upon Canada or upon waters of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River. The mileage of the boundary line by land and the shore line of States bordering on the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River is 6,275 miles.

No Senator from any one of these 15 States, except the Senators from Illinois, has arisen here to urge an increase in the diversion of water by the Chicago Sanitary District in excess of the legal limit fixed by the Supreme Court. Yet the State of Illinois has a frontage on Lake Michigan of only 60 miles, or less than 1 percent of the mileage of the international boundary and shore line on the Great Lakes. It has less than 2 percent of the shore line on the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River.

On the Great Lakes and connecting channels the United States has a shore line of 3,576 miles, with 39 ports, whose commerce exceeded 500,000 short tons each in the year 1931. Out of these 39 ports in 8 States, Illinois has a shore line on the Great Lakes of 60 miles, or less than 2 percent of the total, and 1 port out of 39 ports, all of which would be adversely affected by permitting the Chicago Drainage District to exceed the legal limit of diversion permitted by the United States Supreme Court.

On Lake Michigan alone, the State of Michigan has a shore line of 760 miles and the State of Wisconsin 380 miles. I do not contend, because Wisconsin's frontage on Lake Michigan exceeds that of Illinois by more than 6 to 1 and Michigan's exceeds Illinois' by more than 12 to 1, that the rights of Illinois should therefore be disregarded. I do assert, however, that it is an absurdity that the United States Senate should be asked to disregard the rights of 7 other States, with 38 ports on the Great Lakes and connecting channels, and sacrifice the public-power projects on the St. Lawrence River, in order to permit one State, with one port, to withdraw water from Lake Michigan, which the highest engineering authority in the United States declares is wholly unnecessary for navigation purposes on the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers.

It is a preposterous proposition that the Senators from that single State should come here and set themselves up as the guardians of the sovereignty of Lake Michigan and that they should perform that guardianship by seeking, on behalf of one port among all the States bordering on the Great Lakes system, to divert and extract an excessive amount of water from that system, to the detriment of sister States of the Union and a friendly neighboring nation, the rights and the equities of those sister States having been adjudicated several times in the highest court of this land.

At this point in my remarks I ask leave to insert in the RECORD a table showing the mileage of the international boundary line between the United States and Canada, and so forth.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. So much for the moment as to the question of diversion. I now wish to turn to another question which has been raised in the propaganda which has been circulated against the treaty—

False statements of United States money to be spent in Canada.

No statement has appeared more frequently in the propaganda against the treaty than the claim that 80 percent of the cost of the project is to be expended by the United States in Canada to employ Canadian workers using Canadian materials.

This is a vicious falsehood circulated in this propaganda for the evident purpose of arousing national envy and prejudice against a friendly neighboring nation.

The claim that United States funds expended under this treaty are to go chiefly for Canadian labor and Canadian materials has been publicly and specifically denied by the highest ranking officers of the Corps of Engineers.

On October 20, 1933, Brig. Gen. George B. Pillsbury, Acting Chief of Engineers, made public the following letter to Frank P. Walsh, chairman of the Power Authority of the State of New York:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, October 20, 1933.

FRANK P. WALSH,
Chairman the Power Authority of the State of New York,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. WALSH: In accordance with your request for information on the percentage of funds furnished by the United States under the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty, which will be expended for American labor, material, etc., I take pleasure in advising you that of the total estimated expenditures of American funds of $257,992,000 for both navigation and power works, approximately 80 percent will be expended by United States engineers with United States labor and United States material. The remainder under the terms of subparagraph (b) of article III of the treaty will be for work executed by Canadian engineers and Canadian labor and with Canadian material for works within Canadian territory to be constructed by the temporary St. Lawrence International Rapids Section Commission. Approximately 60 percent of the total cost will be expended on works in the State of New York.

Sincerely yours,

G. B. PILLSBURY,
Brigadier General, Acting Chief of Engineers.

Now, let us consider why 20 percent of the funds contributed by the United States to this project is to be used for the employment of Canadian labor, with Canadian materials.

This proration of the funds to provide employment for Canadian labor with the use of United States funds occurs only in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River, forming the northern boundary of the State of New York. In no other portion of this project, throughout the extent of the Great Lakes and their connecting rivers, is a dollar of American money to be used for the employment of Canadian labor or materials.

In the International Rapids section a temporary St. Lawrence International Rapids Section Commission is set up by the treaty, consisting of 5 representatives of Canada and 5 representatives of the United States.

Mr. President, it becomes necessary to discuss the manner in which the division of costs of this project were arrived at. It must be borne in mind by Senators that large and substantial works were already completed or were nearing completion when this negotiation took place. In every instance where any work done either by the United States or by Canada had been undertaken which did form or would form an integral part of this waterway, each of the respective governments was given consideration to that extent in estimating their share of the total cost.

For instance, Canada has just completed the new Welland Canal around Niagara Falls at a cost of $128,000,000. She has made other improvements which form an integral part of the 27-foot channel project, entirely at her own expense. All these essential improvements made in the past by Canada, and all the essential improvements made in the past by the United States as an integral part of the 27-foot channel, are included in the estimates and both Canada and the United States were given credit for every dollar so expended. The cost of the entire project was divided equally between both countries.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator let me complete this statement before yielding to him?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On account of the fact that Canada, with about one tenth of the population of the United States, had expended more money than the United States on such improvements—that is, improvements which formed an integral part of this waterway—it was necessary for the United States to furnish the funds for building two dams in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River to offset the expenditure of Canada on the Welland Canal and to equalize the net cost between the two countries.

Thus the United States will furnish the money for the erection of these two dams to be built in international waters under the direction of a temporary commission. Every cent of United States funds expended under the direction of the International Rapids Section Commission will go for improvements within the banks of the St. Lawrence River itself, including dikes to be built at certain points on each side of the river to confine the waters of the river and to prevent overflow for which compensation would have to be paid.

The charge has repeatedly been made on this floor and in the propaganda against the treaty which has been circulated throughout the country that the major portion of the United States funds under the treaty will be expended on Canadian soil. The truth is that except for the hydraulic works which are essential to the development of the river itself, not a dollar of American money will be spent on the Canadian side of the international boundary and not one dollar of American money will in any case be spent for rehabilitation improvements, power houses, acquisition of lands, or construction of railroads or highways on Canadian soil.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield; certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the able Senator what was the date of the report which the Senator read under the name of General Pillsbury?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The date of that letter is October 20, 1933.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to say to the able Senator that General Pillsbury is a very high order of man, far from deliberate misrepresentation, either to serve a purpose or to serve the administration; but I have before me the speech General Pillsbury made at Philadelphia, as reported in the annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, in March 1929, when the political subject was not before him for consideration. Without further trespassing on the Senator's time, to be fair to him, I will state that I have read this article, and I am compelled to say that I find a great variance between the speech the general then made and the report which my able friend has just read as of the later date of 1933.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. So far as I know, Mr. President, in all of the official estimates and statements there is not one statement nor estimate which controverts the facts set forth in General Pillsbury's letter. I must state that I am not familiar with, and have not had the opportunity to read, the address to which the Senator refers.

Mr. President, there is hanging on the back of the Chamber a chart which shows the break-down of these funds and the amounts which will be expended, both in the United States and in Canada. Unfortunately, in having the chart enlarged, the figures do not stand out sufficiently for me to use it and to have Senators follow me. I do hope, however, that they will make an inspection of this chart at closer range if they are interested in arriving at the actual facts concerning the division of costs.

Suffice it for me at this time to say that I have had broken down in tables the cost and the percentage of funds of this project.

The first table shows the cost of the entire seaway, including power and the international section.

The second table shows the cost of the International Rapids section development.

The third table shows the funds supplied by the United States for the International Rapids development.

I hope that in considering these figures Senators will bear in mind that this entire development in the International Rapids section is one integral piece of engineering work, and that it is not fair to separate the expenditure of money which will be made by the State of New York not only in contributing to the United States cost of the dams but also to the power houses, the superstructure, and other work which the State of New York has agreed to undertake in an agreement made with the Corps of Engineers, and already confirmed in a resolution which passed the House at the last session of Congress.

I ask leave to have the tables referred to inserted in the RECORD at this point in my address.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The tables are as follows:

Allocation of cost of Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project

	Amount	Percent
Cost of entire seaway, including power in international section	$543,500,000	100.0
Funds supplied by the United States	272,500,000	50.1
United States funds expended for United States labor and materials	219,000,000	40.3
United States funds expended for Canadian labor and materials	53,500,000	9.8
Cost of International Rapids section development	274,500,000	100.0
Funds supplied by United States	215,000,000	78.3
United States funds expended for United States labor and materials	161,500,000	58.8
United States funds expended for Canadian labor and materials	53,500,000	19.5
Funds supplied by United States for International Rapids development	215,000,000	100.0
For United States labor and materials	161,500,000	75.1
For Canadian labor and materials	53,500,000	24.9

United States funds which may be spent for Canadian labor and materials under the treaty, totaling approximately $53,500,000, represent: 9.8 percent of the $543,500,000 estimated cost of the entire project; 19.7 percent of the $272,500,000 fixed as the United States' share of the cost of the entire project; 24.9 percent of the $215,000,000 estimated expenditure of United States funds in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss further today the navigation features of the treaty, upon which, in my opinion, the President has made a complete demonstration of national benefit upon the highest economic and engineering authority that is available to the Executive and to the Senate.

As I view the subject in its broad aspects, this should not be a struggle over the navigation project. A waterway already exists from Duluth and Chicago to the Atlantic Ocean. The canals on the Canadian side of the St. Lawrence River now provide a depth of 14 feet. These canals today, even under the conditions attending the depression, are taxed almost to their full capacity. Every Senator knows that when this capacity is exceeded, as it will be with the return of normal business activity, the commerce of the interior of the continent will inevitably burst its fetters and get access by the shortest route to the sea. Canada has already built four Welland Canals to accommodate the increasing volume of tonnage from the midcontinent. As the President states in his message:

> I call your attention to the simple fact that Canada alone can, if desired, build locks at the Lachine Rapids and the international sector, and thus provide a seaway wholly within Canadian control without treaty participation with the United States. This, however, would be a reversal of the policy of cooperation which the United States and Canada have continuously maintained for generations.
> I want to make it very clear that this great international highway for shipping is, without any question, going to be completed in the near future, and that this completion should be carried out by both nations instead of by one.

POWER INTERESTS FIGHTING THE TREATY

This statement is so evidently true that it becomes apparent, it seems to me, upon the slightest consideration, that the paramount issue which we are considering here in the Senate is not whether a seaway should be completed from the Great Lakes to the ocean, with free navigation for American ships, but whether or not 1,100,000 horsepower should be developed by a public agency to compete with the great private power and utility companies dominated by J. P. Morgan & Co.

The Power Trust never fights in the open. The official files of the Federal Trade Commission disclose scores of instances in which the public utilities have used chambers of commerce, newspapers, public-school textbooks, ministers of the gospel, and other innocent and respectable agencies to spread their propaganda, in order to prevent public competition, and thus to maintain extortionate rates.

The same great banking interests which control the private power and utility companies of New York and New England likewise control the trunk-line railroads of the East.

HOUSE OF MORGAN HAS SELFISH INTEREST

The principal competitor of the St. Lawrence power development provided in this treaty would be the Niagara Hudson Corporation. This corporation and its holding company, the United Corporation, are controlled absolutely by J. P. Morgan & Co., as the recent testimony before the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate shows. J. P. Morgan & Co. likewise is the fiscal agent for the New York Central Railroad, the Michigan Central Railroad, and other roads running parallel to the seaway.

The Niagara Hudson Power Corporation (commonly referred to as the Morgan system) outside of the metropolitan area of New York City (metropolitan area is also Morgan dominated and was his first utility interest) furnishes over 85 percent of the electric service in New York State. The combined assets of the top corporation and its subsidiaries at the end of the year 1931 stood at $799,019,858. The total kilowatt-hours of electric energy generated and purchased during the year 1931 amounted to approximately 6,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours (nearly 7 percent of country's total), or about equal to the capacity of the public power project on the St. Lawrence under the treaty. Of this amount, over 5,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours were sold, for which approximately $66,500,000 was received. (Low average of 1¼ cents due to large industrial customers.)

Outside of the city of Rochester and what is known as the southern tier of counties, including Harlem Valley, where the Associated Gas & Electric system operates, the Niagara Hudson system covers virtually all of the State of New York outside of the metropolitan area.

The four main subholding companies of the Niagara Hudson Power Corporation are Buffalo Niagara & Eastern Power Co., Mohawk Hudson Power Corporation, Power Corporation of New York, Oswego River Power Corporation.

The operating companies of the Niagara Hudson system include the following large corporations: The Niagara Falls Power Co. and its subsidiary, Canadian Niagara Power Co., Ltd., which operates in Canada; Buffalo General Electric Co.; Niagara, Lockport & Ontario Power Co.; New York Power & Light Corporation; Utica Gas & Electric Co.; The Syracuse Lighting Co., Inc.

In addition to the above, Niagara Hudson Power Corporation owns all of the capital stock of the Frontier Corporation, which is the owner of riparian rights on the St. Lawrence River at the site of the proposed development under the treaty, or extending roughly from Ogdensburg to Massena.

Mr. President, Senators may say that they are in favor of public power development in the State of New York and may contend that they are perfectly willing to see that development go forward; but the fact remains that it is only by the exercise of the plenary power of the Federal Government under its right to control navigation that the rights of private power interests already fastened upon this great resource in the International Rapids section can be extinguished. It is impossible to extinguish the rights of the Niagara Hudson Corporation, the Morgan interests, the Aluminum Co. of America, and other vested interests, unless we have a treaty which provides not only for power but for navigation, and which thus extinguishes the right of those selfish power interests to the power already staked out in this great domain of natural resources, as I have so often said, Mr. President, the largest single block of power on the North American continent.

Mr. President, J. P. Morgan & Co., and their allied interests are seeking to destroy this administration, and they are seeking to prevent the ratification of this treaty, not because they fear the effect of the completion of the seaway but because they are determined to prevent a public power development on the St. Lawrence River, like that at Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam.

These banking interests are behind the false propaganda that conjures up war with Great Britain and Canada. They are ready to sow seeds of discord between two friendly neighboring nations, and their propaganda is almost exclusively confined to navigation, but their real interest lies in blocking this public development of power.

Not one Senator in this debate has attacked the power project under this treaty, and yet, as I am prepared to show, it is the power interests of this country, dominated in the East by J. P. Morgan & Co., which are the chief source of opposition outside this Chamber; and they are fighting this treaty because they well know that it is only if this treaty, containing the navigation provisions, is passed that their right to private power claims which they have already entered upon this area can be extinguished.

Mr. President, as has already been pointed out previously in this debate, down to the year 1931 the ablest railroad executives of the United States were open and ardent advocates of the development of a seaway connecting the Great Lakes with the Atlantic. Down to that year, and for nearly a generation preceding it, railroad management took the position President Roosevelt now takes, and repeatedly declared that the creation of a new seacoast for the United States by the completion of this project would benefit the whole Nation, including the rail carriers.

RAILROAD EXECUTIVES WERE FOR THE SEAWAY

During the 10 years preceding 1931 the president of every important western railroad at one time or another publicly endorsed the seaway project.

Howard Elliott, when chairman of the Northern Pacific Railway, said before the Harvard Club, of New York City:

This is a great national project, national in scope and influence. * * * The project will be beneficial to New England and to all the country tributary to the Great Lakes. It will relieve congestion on the railroads reaching the upper Atlantic ports when population and industry are twice what they are today. The project will help coastwise trade, export and import trade between the Middle Western States and foreign countries, and give great opportunity to our merchant-marine fleet.

E. Pennington, president of the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railroad, October 28, 1920:

* * * As for the benefits to be derived if the St. Lawrence project were put through, I think it would be a great thing for the Northwest and Canada to shorten the rail haul. It would have the same beneficial effect on the Northwest as the Panama Canal has had on Pacific coast cities and coast States. * * * Looking to the future of this great Northwest, which is not over half developed, the transportation lines that we have at the present time cannot handle the products of this country. * * *

C. T. Jaffrey, president Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railroad, June 7, 1929:

Personally, I feel the completion of this waterway will be of benefit to these Northwestern States, and anything that is of benefit to them must be of benefit to the railroads operating throughout the territory.

H. E. Byram, president Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co., July 12, 1923:

There is no doubt, to the extent that vessels moving through the canal would carry grain and grain products from the Middle West, that there would be an advantage to the railroads serving lake ports in the release of their cars at such ports rather than on the Atlantic coast.

H. A. Scandrett, president Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co., July 2, 1929:

The movement in volume of export and import traffic from and to eastern termini of western railroads would unquestionably be of benefit to those railroads and the territory they serve.

Charles Donnelly, Northern Pacific Railway Co., May 15, 1925:

* * * The northwestern railroads have always recognized the advantage of transportation via the Lakes in connection with the eastbound movement of grain, lumber, copper, and other products of their territory. The necessary breaking of bulk at the Lake port permits prompt release and return of cars to loading points and to the extent the Lake route is utilized we have an independent railroad operation and thus escape the losses which often attend the delayed return of cars by connecting railroads.

F. W. Sargent, president Chicago & North Western Railroad, September 17, 1925:

* * * The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway will help the Middle West. Anything that will help promote the prosperity of the inland empire lying between the Alleghenies and the Rockies will help the railroads and will be of inestimable value to the entire country.

October 27, 1926:

* * * A direct ocean route from this interior territory to trans-Atlantic markets would stimulate industrial and agricultural growth with resulting benefits to all classes of business, including that of railroad transportation in the region thus benefited.

Ralph Budd, president Great Northern Railway Co., December 7, 1920:

The benefits accruing to the middle and northwestern sections of the United States as a result of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence tidewater project cannot help being apparent to anyone who has given the subject consideration.

The success with which lake-and-rail movement of ore and coal is carried on serves as a splendid illustration of what could be done in a larger way with the tidewater project carried out so that exporting could be carried on freely from this great middle and northwestern territory directly from the termini of the rail lines which serve the territory.

W. G. Bierd, Chicago & Alton Railroad Co., August 2, 1923:

With our own American roads west of the Great Lakes, of what we generally term the central western lines, there can be nothing to lose and everything to gain. We of the central West would still have our eastern connections to handle all-rail commodities, but in times of congestion, or times of shortage of equipment, we would also have the waterway, which, of course, can only mean a more profitable and prosperous condition.

But the completion of this deep waterway could only be advantageous to the central western roads, although I appreciate this is partly a selfish view, that we might prosper to the loss or detriment of certain eastern lines. However, if I believed this to be true, I would not advocate it; but in the end, I do believe that the eastern roads will not suffer by such a water route; in other words, I view this largely as does Sir Henry Thornton.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Government of the United States spends money for the development of its waterways, as do France and Germany; and all those countries spend a great deal of money on canals and on canalizing their rivers, and keep them open for free competition with the government-owned railways, because as a national policy they feel it not only helps the railroads but helps the country as a whole.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am very glad to have the Senator's observation on that point. I listened with great interest to his very able address upon the subject. I am entirely in agreement with him that we shall never have a satisfactory transportation system in this country until there is real coordination between rail and water transportation, and, as I shall try to show in a few moments, I think it is clearly demonstrable from the facts which are already available, that the competition of the Panama Canal with the western railroads has not been detrimental to their interests—has, in fact, increased their tonnage and their revenues.

SEAWAY WILL BENEFIT RAILROADS AND THEIR EMPLOYEES

I am convinced, Mr. President, after a careful consideration of this whole problem, that the completion of this seaway will not adversely affect the interests of either the railroads, their security holders, or the men who are employed on the transportation systems. The Interstate Commerce Commission reports show that railroad freight ton-miles have increased from an average of 162,000,000,000 in the 5-year period 1901–5 to an average of 430,000,000,000 ton-miles in the 5-year period 1926–30. Now, if we except the abnormal war years, these figures show a remarkably steady growth in the annual increase of ton-miles of traffic.

If the figures were plotted upon a chart, Mr. President, and the abnormal years of the war were eliminated, the curve showing the increase of ton-mile traffic in the United States would show an almost unbroken and constant curve of increase for the period from 1901 to 1930.

This is extremely important in considering the effect of this navigation project upon the railroads and their employees, because it has been during recent years that the railroads have experienced an increase of competition, both on waterways and on highways. If this increase in traffic hauled by the railroads is plotted on a curve it indicates a traffic of 650,000,000,000 ton-miles in 1950, or 200,000,000,000 ton-miles more than the all-time peak reached in the year 1929. If we base the calculation upon population growth and the increased per capita ton-miles of traffic, the estimate of increased traffic by the year 1950 is very like the estimate based upon the yearly increase in traffic to which I have just referred. These two methods of calculation concerning the traffic to be expected in 1950 indicate that the traffic demands on our transportation facilities in that year will be at least 30 times the estimated traffic on the seaway.

When we confine the comparison to the railroads which parallel the seaway, we find that increased traffic demands for transportation in 1950 will exceed the ports traffic of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway 10 times over. In considering this phase of the question, it should also be pointed out that during the period 1920–29, when competition on both highways and waterways was increasing to a marked degree, the railroads enjoyed a revenue which enabled them to pay out during this period an average of a billion dollars a year in dividends and interest.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I do not desire to interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am perfectly willing and glad to yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. I should like to ask the Senator a question later about one of the power aspects of the development, but I shall ask that question at a time when the Senator has finished his address, without interrupting him at the present moment, and if the Senator would be good enough to indicate to me when it would be agreeable for him to answer I should then be glad to ask him the question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will be very glad to do so.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. On the point to which the Senator has just addressed himself, that the railroads enjoyed a revenue which enabled them to pay out a billion dollars a year in dividends and interest for the period indicated——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The period 1920–29.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes. It is a fact, however, that none of the railroads' earnings, of any consequence, went into an amortization of their debts.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is perfectly true; but I am not arguing that point. I am saying that in the period 1920 to 1929, when the railroads were experiencing an increase in competition from both highways and waterways, they were able to pay out in interest and dividends on the average $1,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will permit another interruption? I think it is also a fact that during that period, while they did not amortize any of their old debt, they floated additional bond issues, which contributed to a new debt, to which they did not apply any funds for sinking-fund purposes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That may be true. The Senator, I infer, is criticizing the financial policy of the railroads, and at sometime I would be glad to go into that with him. I do not think, from the inference I draw from his interruption, that we differ very much about the wisdom of the policy of the railroads. It does not, however, alter the point I am trying to make, that during this period, when competition by water and by highway was growing, that the railroads enjoyed a revenue during the period 1920 to 1921 which on the average enabled them to pay out a billion dollars a year in interest and dividends.

Those who contend that the seaway will absorb existing traffic from the railroads have not studied this question in the light of the data now available.

PANAMA CANAL AND THE WESTERN RAILROADS

The Panama Canal affords the best example of the opening of an important water route in competition with the railroads. The analysis of this competition shows that the water-borne traffic through the Canal has been more largely in heavy, bulky products which are low revenue producers for the railroads. It shows that at the same time, however, the railroads have increased their traffic in manufactured articles and other higher revenue types of traffic. The cargo tonnage through the Canal grew from approximately 4,000,000 tons in 1915 to 30,000,000 tons in 1930. It might be assumed by those who have not studied this question that this traffic would inevitably have resulted in diminished revenue for the western roads, against which the Canal offers its most serious competition. The facts are, however, that at the very period while this tremendous growth in tonnage carried through the Canal was taking place the western roads secured an increase, not only in total traffic, but also in density of traffic as compared with the period before the Panama Canal was opened.

The gross and net income of the western roads increased markedly during the period from 1915 to 1930. In the year 1929 it reached an all-time peak. The net income in that year of the western roads was $336,769,000. This was an increase of 48 percent over the peak year, 1913, in their history before the Panama Canal was opened. The inescapable conclusion from these studies is that the tendency in traffic changes and the special facilities of the railroads for handling high-yield revenue traffic in which the time element of transportation is a factor will be greatly stimulated by the proposed St. Lawrence Waterway. The possibility of drawing upon the raw materials of the world at lower costs than the present would inevitably bring rapid expansion to the industries already located at the ports and throughout the tributary seaway area. Obviously it will also make possible the development of many new industries. Perhaps equally important from the economic point of view and from the point of view of the railroads, the seaway will save many of the industries already established which are now menaced by diminishing sources of raw materials. There can be no question that the opening of the seaway will be of great benefit to the steel-producing communities located from Pittsburgh to Chicago, and benefits to those communities and to those industries will inevitably result in increasing traffic for the railroads.

The railroads likewise will benefit in the opportunities the seaway will afford for the development of raw material resources and manufactures in that great area which lies west of Lake Superior.

The inevitable industrial expansion on and adjacent to the Great Lakes will afford millions of ton-miles of new high-yielding revenue traffic to the railroads to be transported inland. It will develop millions of new ton-miles of traffic to be hauled by the railroads from adjacent agricultural sections to urban industrial localities. In this connection it should be borne in mind that the seaway cannot be completed until 1942. Its total estimated tonnage is less than 5 percent of the estimated increase in tonnage that will be available to the railroads by that time.

It is upon the basis of the new data which have been gathered at the direction of the President that President Roosevelt predicated the statement in his message which, it seems to me, should set at rest, once and for all, the apprehension on the part of the railroads and their employees that the seaway will injure their interests. I quote:

For example, I am convinced that the building of the St. Lawrence seaway will not injure the railroads or throw their employees out of work. * * *

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. May I further interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin to say that, in my opinion, a great deal of the apprehension on the part of the railroads and railroad labor which has led to opposition to the treaty is based upon the delusion that the ships using the seaway can travel inland and carry cargoes in competition with the railroads into the hinterland?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Their opposition, apparently, is based upon the misapprehension that the tonnage which would be hauled in by the ships would either be dumped in the Lakes or would be dumped upon the docks of the ports on the Great Lakes and never moved anywhere or used in manufacturing any articles which would require any transportation facilities.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not think the Senator can put too much emphasis upon the proposition he was recently urging, to wit, that it will not be until 1942 that the proposed seaway can have any bearing of any nature whatsoever upon any competitive phase of our transportation system in the United States. In other words, even if it were to be conceded for the sake of the argument that the seaway through its competition would take railroad jobs away from railroad labor, it must also be conceded, on the other side, that not one railroad job can be affected in any possible degree until 1942.

I can fully understand the feeling of restlessness and unhappiness and uncertainty with which railroad labor contemplates its situation in 1934, but we must project our vision into 1942 in order to get a fair estimate of the situation and to do justice to the equation.

I am confident that the Senator is wholly justified in his estimate respecting the compensating traffic which will have been developed in 1942, but, fundamentally, he puts a square challenge to the labor criticism of the pending treaty when he asks them to lift their eyes from 1934 and contemplate the situation in terms of 1942. It seems to me that cannot be too strongly emphasized.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. President, when I discussed the pending treaty at the special session, on May 29, 1933——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, with the consent of the able Senator from Wisconsin, I should like to address myself to my distinguished friend and antagonist, the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does the Senator say "antagonist"?

Mr. LEWIS. He is very much an antagonist to my contention. The Senator from Michigan encourages the able Senator from Wisconsin by giving him an illustration indicating that those who now fear some trouble to themselves are worrying themselves about a matter as far away as 1942, and he cannot see why such fears at such a distance should now enter into consideration. I ask my friend from Michigan where is the validity in the philosophy of the able Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Michigan when they present what they profess to be the blessings which they contend will follow after 1942 the construction of the canal while they deny to others the right to contend concerning the curse which will follow to them under the same kind of construction and the same kind of usage?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have nothing to say about the objection the Senator from Illinois persists in raising against the treaty and the project, but I do insist that the consideration of 1934 transportation conditions, in the midst of a depression, which we hope is to be shortly cured, is not a fair test of a project which cannot come into operation until 1942. I insist that the difference between measuring and assessing the project in 1934 and in 1942 rests upon the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission gives us the best possible authenticated opinion that transportation facilities will be needed in 1942 in a specified degree to such an extent that this project, even if it were competitive, could not take up more than a small portion of the newly created traffic and transportation needs. Therefore, I submit that 1942 transportation conditions and 1934 transportation conditions are two totally and utterly unrelated propositions.

Mr. LEWIS. Therefore, I answer, if such be true—and such, I admit, is true—how can it be consistently said that those who fear danger to themselves from the results must not be equally accepted in their fears as are those who now profess benefits based upon the same distance of time? It is a calculation, and why adopt the calculation that is rosy in its promise and deny that which is cloudy in its threat?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to say, in reply to the comment just made by the Senator from Illinois, that we are basing these estimates upon figures taken from the Interstate Commerce Commission reports; that they are the most accurate available information; that they have been gathered at the direction of the President and transmitted to the Senate for its study. They are entitled to more weight in this connection than the fears of special interests which have not considered and weighed these new data.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF NEW YORK AGAINST THE TREATY

Mr. President, one of the leading organizations opposed to this treaty is the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. That is the same organization which took the lead a few weeks ago in opposition to the financial policy of this administration.

In discussing this question on May 29, 1933, I presented to the Senate an analysis of the membership of the New York State Chamber of Commerce. This analysis demonstrates that the chamber is not representative of the business and economic interests of the State of New York. I desire to quote from portions of that analysis in order that the Senate may have an understanding of the influences which are responsible for the bitter opposition of the New York chamber to this treaty.

Mr. President, I ask leave to insert at this point certain extracts from my remarks on that occasion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

On November 18, 1932, a representative of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee in opposition to the pending treaty. This organization presented a long report and copies of resolutions strongly opposing the development of the St. Lawrence River.

At the regular monthly meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York on April 6, 1933, a further report and resolution were unanimously adopted, advancing in almost identical terms the proposal for an economic study presented on the floor of the Senate on April 17 by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND].

The resolutions adopted on April 6 are as follows:

"Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York urges upon the Senate of the United States that action on the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty be held in abeyance until official and up-to-date data has been made available by a competent nonpartisan body upon the expenses of operation, the amount of traffic, the savings to the United States, and other economic questions involved in the St. Lawrence project; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this report be sent to the President and Members of the Senate."

This was the origin of the demand that, after more than 30 years of investigation, the United States Senate should not be permitted to pass upon the pending treaty until an entirely new economic study was authorized and the findings resulting therefrom reported to this body. That demand has been met by the report submitted by the President with his message on January 10.

On October 6, 1932, the Chamber of Commerce of New York adopted a report which condemned the St. Lawrence development in its entirety. I quote from this report:

"This chamber has gone on record on several occasions against Government participation in business. It seems as if the huge expenditure contemplated on the St. Lawrence is closely akin to the enterprises this chamber has so often criticized. * * * No scientific principles exist which can be used as a guide in allocating the expenditures on the canal which are for navigation to be paid by the Government, and the expenditures which are for water power and accordingly should be self-sustaining. The result will be that the private electric power industry will not know for years what competition to expect from the St. Lawrence. Also, the railroad industry will be uncertain as to the effect the opening of the canal will have upon its business. It might even develop that the Government will go into the operation of barges or similar craft on the St. Lawrence Waterway when completed, as it has on the Mississippi River, which this chamber condemned on December 3, 1931. It might even happen that Congress would decide to put the Federal Government still further into the water-power business."

In an earlier report, on similar grounds, the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York strongly condemned the Muscle Shoals power project, embodied in the Norris bill passed by Congress by an overwhelming vote, and signed by President Roosevelt.

I have before me the analysis of the membership of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York to which I have referred.

The analysis demonstrates that the pending St. Lawrence Treaty is being opposed today with the support of the leading partners of J. P. Morgan & Co., and the powerful combination of railroad and public-utility companies operating in the eastern section of the country which are under Morgan control.

The analysis shows beyond question that the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, which has been active in the organized opposition to the pending treaty, represents the financial district in Wall Street, and is utterly indifferent to the benefits this project will bring to the consumers of electricity in New York City, and to the farms and homes in the State as a whole.

The pretense that the New York Chamber of Commerce is in any true sense representative of the State of New York as a whole is shown to be a fiction by the fact that out of 1,538 members, only 142, or less than 10 percent of the total number, show an address outside of the city of New York. Most of the 142 either show addresses within the metropolitan area or indicate that they have retired and live outside the State. A careful check reveals not more than 10 who can in any sense be considered as representing any local business interests in the State outside the New York City area.

The interests represented by the membership of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York are even more limited than the above statement would indicate. More than 50 percent of the membership actually belongs to the area known as "lower Manhattan" and appears to be definitely associated with the financial capital of the country. There are 164 members giving a Wall Street address.

A classification of the membership by occupation shows the following:

Banking, including investment bankers	510
Insurance	105
Real estate	62
Brokers	53
Shipping	41
Railroads	39
Utilities	32
	842
Other classifications	696
Total membership	1,538

The above figures show clearly that the New York chamber is dominated by New York City financial and banking interests, and the great corporations associated with them. A considerable proportion of the members have a clear-cut, selfish interest in blocking the St. Lawrence development and this interest is far from being identified with the general interest, either of the people of New York or of the country as a whole.

The 510 listed as bankers include in their number 64 who are also railroad directors and 36 who are directors of important utilities interested in electric power. Thus, the railroad and power interests have a considerably larger representation in the chamber than the original list would indicate.

J. P. Morgan & Co. alone accounts for 13 members of the chamber including J. Pierpont Morgan himself, Henry S. Morgan, Junius S. Morgan, Jr., Thomas W. Lamont, Thomas S. Lamont, Henry P. Davison, E. T. Stotesbury, Charles Steele, Thomas Cochran, R. C. Leffingwell, Harold Stanley, George Whitney, and Francis D. Bartow.

Kuhn, Loeb & Co. are represented by Otto Kahn, J. J. Hanauer, and William Wiseman.

The big public-utility interests which have been committing American business to opposition to publicly owned utility projects are well represented.

Floyd L. Carlisle, chairman of the boards of the Niagara Hudson Power Corporation, the Consolidated Gas Co. of New York, and the New York Edison Co., is a member.

George B. Cortelyou, president of the Consolidated Gas Co., holding company for all the New York City electric properties, is a member.

Lewis Gawtry, who is a member of the chamber, is a trustee of Consolidated Gas Co. of New York and a director of its subsidiary electric companies, including New York Edison Co., United Electric Light & Power Co., Westchester Lighting Co., and Yonkers Electric Light & Power Co.

Donald G. Geddes, a member of the chamber, is trustee of Consolidated Gas Co. of New York, and director of New York Edison, United Electric Light & Power, New York & Queens Electric Light & Power, etc. Other trustees of Consolidated Gas in the list are Charles E. Mitchell and George Whitney, of J. P. Morgan & Co.

Harold S. Sutton, assistant secretary both of Floyd L. Carlisle & Co. and Niagara Hudson Power Corporation, is a member.

Harold Stanley, already noted as a member of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., is also present as a director of Niagara Hudson, the United Corporation, the United Gas Improvement Co., and the Columbia Gas & Electric Co., representing Morgan's far-flung utility interests. Other Morgan partners appearing as utility directors are E. T. Stotesbury, of United Gas Improvement, and George Whitney, of Consolidated Gas.

John E. Alfred is a member of the chamber, representing a considerable number of utility companies, including several Canadian companies directly interested in preventing the development of cheap power by New York State. These are: Montreal Light Heat & Power Co., Cedar Rapids Manufacturing & Power Co., Shawinigan Water Power Co., and the Saguenay Transmission Co. Alfred is also a director of the Duke-Price Power Co. and the Pennsylvania Water & Power Co.

The Henry L. Doherty interests, which have been actively pressing an application before the Federal Power Commission for the right of the American Super-Power Corporation to develop the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River for power, have three representatives in the membership of the chamber of commerce, including W. Alton Jones, chairman of the executive committee of Henry L. Doherty & Co., as well as director of Cities Service and its subsidiaries; Arthur B. Leach, of A. B. Leach & Co., chairman of the executive committee of the American Super-Power Corporation, which is making the application; and J. M. McMillen, of the Henry L. Doherty and Cities Service.

Lewis E. Pierson, director of Electric Bond & Share Co. and National Power & Light, discussed at considerable length by Senator NORRIS on May 4 in his remarks on the attitude of the United States Chamber of Commerce toward Muscle Shoals, is a member.

Other important utility men in the list are: Frank L. Dame, president of the North American Co.; Philip G. Gossler, president of the Columbia Gas & Electric Corporation and its subsidiaries; E. T. Stotesbury, a J. P. Morgan director of the United Gas Improvement Co.; Albert A. Tilney, chairman of the board of Bankers' Trust Co., who is also director of American Gas & Electric Co., Electric Power & Light Corporation, and National Power & Light Co.; Louis H. Seagrave, director of Standard Gas & Electric Co., Standard Power & Light Corporation, and U. S. Electric Power Corporation; Charles A. Stone, chairman of the board of Stone & Webster; and many others.

Eastern railroads are represented by such executives as W. W. Atterbury, president of the Pennsylvania; Albert J. County, vice president of the Pennsylvania; Patrick E. Crowley, former president of the New York Central; John M. Davis, president of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western; Edward E. Loomis, president of the Lehigh Valley; Leonor F. Loree, president of the Delaware & Hudson; Roy Barton White, president of the Central Railroad of New Jersey; and Daniel Willard, president of the Baltimore & Ohio, as well as by Cornelius Vanderbilt, member of board of managers of the Delaware & Hudson Co. and director of Illinois Central.

This is the organization which is the head and front of the opposition to the St. Lawrence project. It is this little group of Wall Street bankers, public-utility officials, and railroad executives which is resisting the policy of President Roosevelt's administration to develop the St. Lawrence for power and navigation, and which is appealing to Members of this body to betray party pledges by blocking and defeating the pending treaty.

J. P. Morgan & Co. has a direct interest in the defeat of the St. Lawrence Treaty.

This great banking house holds dominion over an empire composed of the chief trunk-line railroads and public utility power corporations of the East. It has underwritten hundreds of millions of dollars in railroad and power securities.

The House of Morgan is pursuing the narrow, short-sighted, and selfish policy of bottling up the interior of the United States and preventing its development by seeking to continue the obtsruction to navigation existing today in the undeveloped International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River.

The development of this section of the river under the pending treaty is opposed by Morgan and allied interests in part because it will affect the transportation monopoly of the Morgan trunk-line roads running from Chicago to the seaboard, but chiefly because it will produce 1,100,000 horsepower, to be developed by a public agency furnishing electricity at low rates, in competition with the Morgan-controlled power companies.

This explains why 13 of the partners of J. P. Morgan & Co. are participating as members of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York in its campaign to defeat the St. Lawrence Treaty.

The people of the Middle West are in no mood today to tolerate this policy of obstruction. The House of Morgan, with all its vast influence and wealth, is not powerful enough to stand in the way of a public project that is vital to the development of this country. You cannot cheat 45,000,000 people of their birthright and sabotage the forward movement in transportation and industry and expect the people of the midcontinent to submit to it forever.

There is another special interest which has a stake in the defeat of the St. Lawrence Treaty—the Aluminum Co. of America, owned and controlled by the Mellon family.

During the hearings before the Foreign Relations Committee, the fact was developed that the Aluminum Co. is diverting 20,000 cubic second-feet of the waters of the St. Lawrence to its plant at Massena, N.Y., for the generation of hydroelectric power. The Aluminum Co. attempted to secure the right to divert one fourth of the entire American share of the flow of the St. Lawrence under the treaty, a right which was denied through the vigilance of the power authority of the State of New York.

The passage of the joint resolution which has already been voted by the House and the ratification of the pending treaty will extinguish the diversion which is today being exercised by the Aluminum Co. Every day that ratification is delayed the Aluminum Co. is enriched by the diversion of the waters of the St. Lawrence, for which it does not pay a dollar into the Federal Treasury.

It may be said in passing that the Aluminum Co., later in combination with the General Electric and the Du Pont interests, sought for more than a quarter of a century to obtain control of the water-power rights on the St. Lawrence which were vested in the people of New York in 1931 by Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask permission to insert a letter and memorandum from the Northern Federation of Chambers of Commerce of New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE NORTHERN FEDERATION OF CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE,
Alexandria Bay, N.Y., January 23, 1934.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr.,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I am enclosing a brief memorandum prepared by this organization covering the proposed St. Lawrence seaway development.

Regardless of the propaganda emitting from New York City, the northern half of New York State is solidly in favor of the St. Lawrence development. There is a chance, if this development goes through, for a new industrial center to be added to the United States which will be of equal size and importance to the Pittsburgh region or the proposed Tennessee Valley industrial sector. In addition to the industrial development, the St. Lawrence development offers a chance for relief of the domestic user of electricity in this territory where rates are excessively burdensome and also offers the Midwest manufacturer and farmer an opportunity to get back on equal terms with the eastern and Pacific seaboards and to recover the disadvantage which became effective with the completion of the Panama Canal.

I sincerely trust that you will do everything in your power to further this major plank in President Roosevelt's program of economic rehabilitation.

Very sincerely yours,

GEORGE J. SAVAGE, Secretary.

STATEMENT OF THE NORTHERN FEDERATION OF CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE URGING THE SIGNING OF THE ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY TREATY BY THE UNITED STATES SENATE

If the Straits of Gibraltar were blocked through obstructions so that only vessels of 14-foot draft could get through, there would be no argument about the immediate necessity of excavating the channel immediately so that the vessels of the world could once more reach the ports of the Mediterranean Sea.

This imaginary situation exists in close parallel in this country today; we have a vast inland sea of the Great Lakes, and connecting channels are between all the Lakes, so that an ocean-going boat can go from Ogdensburg to Duluth without a bit of trouble, provided her draft is 25 feet or under. But ocean-going boats cannot get up to the Lakes and the lake boats cannot get down to the seaports because of the bottle neck at the International Rapids section of the river. And as a result a vast region extending over most of the northern half of the continent is land-locked and 40,000,000 people are deprived of their desire to have free access to the ocean.

Since the early days of discovery on this continent the importance of providing a bypass around these rapids of the St. Lawrence has been evident to the rulers of North America. First the French and then the English built locks around the rapids of this mighty river, and as early as 1797 provision for a 9-foot lock around the various sections of the rapids was made. Gradually this 9-foot depth was increased to 14.

However, since 1914 the depth of these channels has not been increased. The railroads are not expected to run with 1914 style of locomotives and the power companies are not expected to generate power with 1914 style of equipment. Why expect lake shipping to get along with 1914 type of locks?

Aside from the advantages to 80 percent of the ocean shipping, the demands of lake shipping alone require the deepening of these locks to meet modern conditions.

COSTS OF THE SEAWAY

Much has been made of the argument that the United States will spend more money on this project than Canada. The facts are that each nation is given credit for the money they have already spent in making certain channels wholly in their own waters navigable for vessels of 25-foot draft, and the total additional expense for the international section is then divided after giving these credits. The works charged to the power development are to be built by the Province of Ontario and the State of New York, each on their own side of the river, and none of this power expense is chargeable to the United States Government.

EMPLOYMENT EFFECT

Conservative estimates are that over 22,000 men will be employed in the building of the navigation and power works, and that well over 50,000 men will receive employment through the new factories erected at the source of the power. These figures are for the direct employment only and the indirect employment of men in the plants producing the materials used in these projects will run to many times that figure.

POWER

It is estimated by engineers of the New York State Power Authority that 1,100,000 horsepower will be developed on the American side of the rapids, and that this power can be distributed for costs that are approximately as follows: In the Utica area, 130 miles away, 2.99 mills per kilowatt-hour, with 60-percent load factor; at the end of the 300-mile transmission line, 4.20 mills, with 60-percent load factor.

The people of the State of New York are paying an average of 6 cents per kilowatt-hour, and in the vicinity of the proposed development 10 and 11 cents per kilowatt-hour. They look across at their neighbors in Ontario who are paying a cent and a half per kilowatt-hour, and they read in the papers of the Tennessee Valley development and the Columbia River development. Why must they be forced to put up with their present rate schedule and with an undeveloped countryside just because a few of the big banking houses and railroads are against this power development?

President Roosevelt has proposed a method of utility regulation known as the "yardstick method", and nowhere is this yardstick more needed than in New York State where 12,000,000 people are paying exorbitant rates because of the absence of such a yardstick.

PROPONENTS AND OPPOSITION

In opposition to this project we find the General Electric Co., the Aluminum Co. of America, the banker and utility controlled Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, the railroads, the utility companies, and a few eastern ports.

In favor of this development we have the people of the Midwest agricultural States, the people of the State of New York as expressed through their legislature when they passed the power authority bill, all the consumer organizations in the State of New York, the Republican Party of the United States through their platform pledges, the former President of the United States Herbert Hoover, and finally the President of the United States Franklin D. Roosevelt, who won national recognition through his fight against the power interests of the State who wanted to develop the St. Lawrence privately instead of in the people's interest.

INDUSTRY

The northern half of New York State has never been developed industrially because of the absence of transportation and cheap power. Within 50 miles of the proposed development there are large quantities of magnetic ore, zinc, lead, arsenic, molybdenum, and the materials for a huge ceramic industry. Lack of fuel and power, combined with the transportation factor, have prevented the development of these mineral resources.

The St. Lawrence development will provide the transportation and the power development will provide the heat to refine these metals.

There is a definite relationship between the development of power resources and the resultant industrial expansion which follows the power development. Using the experience of the Province of Ontario, the following relationship between the power and industrial development has been developed:

Capital invested per 1,000 horsepower in industry, $1,250,000.

Annual salaries and wages per 1,000 horsepower, $200,000.

Employees per 1,000 horsepower, 185.

Using these figures as a basis, the installation of 1,000,000 horsepower means $550,000,000 additional capital investment in industrial plants, $90,000,000 additional annual pay roll, $220,000,000 additional factory output annually, and 82,500 additional workers in industrial plants.

Shall we let this huge investment and huge annual pay roll migrate to Canada, or shall we help New York State and the country at large by adding this investment in industry and this pay roll to that of this side of the river and boundary?

Respectfully submitted.

GEORGE J. SAVAGE, Secretary.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now, Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Washington, as I am about to conclude, if he desires to ask me a question.

Mr. BONE. I hope the Senator will agree with one of the conclusions which I want to state in my question. For a great many years this country witnessed what was to me a very sordid spectacle, a monstrous diversion of public functions and a ruthless invasion of the United States Treasury for the benefit of private business interests in the building and operation of the Muscle Shoals power project. It was built at great expense out of the Public Treasury; and because it was hamstrung by the Congress, the Government was compelled to sell power at the bus boards of that plant to the Alabama Power Co., a private power organization, for 2 mills per kilowatt-hour. I visited that section of the country a few years ago, and I saw that same power retailed by private power companies, which were then the sole and exclusive beneficiaries of this vast public expenditure, for prices ranging up to 18 cents a kilowatt-hour, or 90 times what the private companies paid the Government for the power.

Since the element of production of power has been brought into this argument repeatedly by the Senator from Wisconsin, by my good friend the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and by others, it becomes important, it seems to me, for us to have a clear picture of what is to be done with the power that is to be developed on the St. Lawrence, because, if that is to be in any wise a determining factor in the mind of myself or other Members of this body, then, certainly we have a right to know or to be assured to as great a degree as is possible that there will not be a repetition of the Muscle Shoals fiasco; that the taxpayers of the country will not be sweated in taxation to build at public expense a great hydroelectric development only to enrich the Morgan power syndicate of the State of New York. That point becomes pertinent and important in light of the Senator's declaration made a few moments ago, and that leads me to ask the Senator this question. Is there the possibility and probability in the State of New York that this development, which will make available 1,100,000 horsepower of electric energy, will be developed through an agency that will effectively transmit this power to the ultimate consumer at a low price, some agency through which private power companies will not be able to build one toll gate after another with which to reap excessive profits?

I have been reading, Mr. President, with a great deal of interest, a series of articles running in the New York American dealing with the controversy between the people of Westchester County—I think it is—in the State of New York, and the Yonkers Power Co., which I believe is either an affiliate or is tied in with the Morgan power group. Some of the figures that have been published in this series of articles are astounding. For instance, I note in the issue of January 31 that a small neighborhood store pays $27.55 for 300 kilowatt-hours of light service, and that the charge for the same amount of light service to a home, which has a somewhat better rate, is $18.81 for 300 kilowatt-hours, or an average throughout of 6⅓ cents per kilowatt-hour. It seems to me incredible that in any civilized community of this country a private power company can exact a rate like that for domestic use for 300 kilowatt-hours of service.

As the Senator from Wisconsin is aware, I come from a section of the country where there is a tremendously big hydroelectric development, and I claim to know a little something about the cost of developing electric energy. I am wondering whether the State of New York now has an agency in existence able to safeguard the rights of the consumers. I am aware of some of the work that is being done there, but I want the Senator to assure this body that there is an agency in the State of New York that can effectively transmit the current to the people of New York, the ultimate consumers, if this project shall be approved? It will not do, in my judgment, Mr. President, for this plant to be built and the current to be sold at the bus bars to private companies that then will distribute it, because we may have a repetition of the Muscle Shoals fiasco; and I want the Senator to tell me, and in so doing to tell other Members of this body, whether, if this development shall be undertaken at a cost of somewhere around $90,000,000 on the part of the State of New York, we can have assurance that the people of New York and not the Morgan power syndicate will derive the advantage of it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, there can be no question that if this treaty shall be ratified and the power project developed, it will be developed under the New York State Power Authority created under the leadership of Mr. Roosevelt while he was Governor of the State of New York for the specific purpose of protecting the rights of the people in this great natural resource, namely, the power of the St. Lawrence River.

When the treaty was finally negotiated the question of the division of cost between the New York State Power Authority and the United States Government came up. A series of conferences were held and finally an agreement was arrived at whereby the State of New York was to pay $89,000,000 of the cost of the development of the works in the International Rapids section.

There was passed by the House of Representatives at the last session, and there is still pending in the Senate, a joint resolution authenticating and carrying that agreement between the New York State Power Authority and the Government of the United States into legal effect. I will quote from a proviso in that joint resolution which has the full approval and the active support of the New York State Power Authority as well as of the President of the United States:

Provided, That no part of the United States share of the water in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River shall be diverted for the benefit of any person or private corporation, nor shall the use of any part of said water or the rights pertaining to said water be sold, leased, or otherwise alienated to any person or private corporation for the generation of hydroelectric power.

If the Senator will refer to page 20 of Senate Document No. 110, I will read from the heading "Status of St. Lawrence Power Project Under the Laws of New York":

The St. Lawrence power project of the State of New York is provided for in chapter 722 of the Laws of New York, approved by the Governor April 27, 1931—

The reference is to Governor Roosevelt—

This act was the fruition of 25 years of effort to provide for development of St. Lawrence power by the State in the public interest. Licenses had been sought by private corporations for the right to exploit the power resources in the international rapids section, but such applications were rejected by both State and Federal agencies.

Section 5 of the act specifically directed the power authority "to cooperate with the appropriate agencies and officials of the United States Government to the end that any project undertaken" by the trustee—

"shall be consistent with and in aid of the plans of the United States for the improvement of commerce and navigation along the St. Lawrence River, and shall be so planned and constructed as to be adaptable to the plans of the United States therefor, so that the necessary channels, locks, canals, and other navigational facilities may be constructed and installed by the United States in, through, and as part of the said project."

Section 5 directed the trustees to—

"'develop, maintain, manage, and operate' the project and 'to make provision so that municipalities and other political subdivisions of the State * * * may secure a reasonable share of the power' 'subject to conditions which shall assure the resale of such power to domestic and rural consumers at the lowest possible price.'"

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With pleasure.

Mr. BONE. I notice in the papers there is a controversy in the State of New York induced by the action of Governor Lehman in asking the legislature to change the law there so that municipalities might own their own electric distribution system. New York appears to be somewhat old-fashioned and has quaint ideas about some things. They have a provision of law, or perhaps I should say an absence of a provision of law, that makes it impossible for a city to own its own electric distribution system unless it has incorporated that provision in its charter, and not having that power it cannot get it except by going to the legislature. If the New York Power Authority wants to give this power to cities, it can do so, but otherwise they are trussed up in a strait-jacket of law and cannot get the power to sell to their own. They are liable to be harmed and rendered absolutely impotent even though the New York Power Authority might want to give them this power and make it available to them.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think that is a logical deduction——

Mr. BONE. Of course that is a local condition. I admit that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think it is a logical deduction which the Senator has made, waving aside the question of whether or not the legislation will be enacted, because I wish to point out that a formula was set up by the New York Power Authority Act to which any contracts made with private companies for transmission and distribution of current must conform. The act specifically provided for—

(a) Full and complete disclosure to the power authority of all factors of cost in transmission and distribution of power, so that rates to consumers may be fixed initially in the contract and may be adjusted from time to time on the basis of true cost data.

(b) Periodic revisions of the service and rates to consumers on the basis of accurate cost data obtained by such accounting methods and systems as shall be approved by the trustees.

(c) That rates, services, and practices of the purchasing, transmitting, and distributing companies in respect to the power generated by this project shall be governed by the provisions and principles established in the contract, and not by the regulations of the Public Service Commission or by the general principles of public service law regulating rates, services, and practices.

That puts the matter entirely in the hands of the power authority.

Mr. BONE. Of course, the Senator is aware that it would invite a recasting of the rate structures of every private power company in the State of New York, because manifestly they could not sell power from a public plant on the St. Lawrence at one price and power on the same service lines in another section at another price. It would invite a complete recasting of their entire rate structure.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And that is exactly what I think would happen.

Mr. BONE. I believe the Senator shares my view that that will be a very happy circumstance.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Judging by the manner in which the trustees have fought for this project and fought to maintain the public interest in it, I think we need have no fear that they will not exercise every legal and economic advantage which the law so sweepingly confers upon them to assure that electricity shall be delivered to the consumers at the lowest possible rate, regardless of whether or not Governor Lehman wins his fight to amend the law of New York at this session to provide that municipalities may own their own distributing systems.

Since the enactment of the law the trustees of the power authority have recommended additional legislation to permit municipalities which do not now enjoy that right under their charters to purchase St. Lawrence power for distribution to consumers.

In his message to the legislature, January 3, 1934, the Governor of New York made the following recommendation:

I trust that during this session a definite conclusion will be reached by the Federal Government on the treaty with Canada for the development of the St. Lawrence River. The important thing is that power be developed as quickly as possible for the benefit of the consumers of electricity in this State.

Pending the final settlement of this problem I repeat the recommendation made to you last year, that you adopt legislation to permit municipalities of the State, after approval by a referendum vote, to purchase and sell electricity developed from the St. Lawrence River. Municipalities will in this way be able to buy cheap electricity, and at the same time be given a potent weapon with which to compel existing public-utility companies to provide them with electricity at reasonable rates.

The evident intent and effect of the laws of New York providing for the St. Lawrence power project has been the provision of a yardstick on electrical costs and rates for the benefit of the consumers of current and for the protection of the public against unfair charges.

The development of the St. Lawrence by a public agency represents the last opportunity available to provide the northeastern section of the United States with the benefits assured other sections through development of Muscle Shoals, Boulder Dam, the Columbia River, and similar public projects.

The Senator raised some question as to the cost of electricity in Yonkers, near New York City, where consumers enjoy the privilege of paying their bills to a private power corporation owned and controlled through holding companies by J. P. Morgan & Co. I want to invite the attention of the Senator to the estimates of cost. In the first place, I point out that under an agreement already reached between the United States Engineers and the Power Authority of New York the investment of $89,726,750, to be assumed by the New York Power Authority as the share of the total cost of developing the International Rapids section allocable to power, will make power available at an investment cost of $81.57 per installed horsepower and $115.74 per primary horsepower. It renders the proposed power development one of the most economical on the continent, comparing with an investment cost of $136 per installed horsepower for the present capacity of Conowingo, $120 for Fifteen Mile Falls, N.H., and $122 at Muscle Shoals.

I also point out that none of the projects which I have mentioned have the large percentage of primary power which is available on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. President, in connection with the effect which this might have on existing rates in the State of New York and the other States in the northeastern section which are within transmission distance, I want to point out that the St. Lawrence power can be transmitted to southern New York, a distance of approximately 300 miles, with allowance for transmission losses, approximately 2.2 mills at a 60-percent load factor and 1.6 mills at an 80-percent load factor.

St. Lawrence power can be transmitted to the Utica area, a distance of 135 miles, with allowance for transmission losses, for approximately 0.97 mills at a 60-percent load factor, and 0.73 mills at an 80-percent load factor.

On the basis of the above conclusions the total cost of St. Lawrence power delivered at the end of the 300-mile transmission line would be 4.20 mills at a 60-percent load factor and 3.13 mills at an 80-percent load factor. The corresponding figures for delivery in the Utica area would be 2.99 mills at a 60-percent load factor and 2.24 mills at an 80-percent load factor.

Mr. President, I had not intended to go into the power aspect of the matter, but I appreciate the great interest of the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] in public power development. His long and distinguished record in his own State in behalf of the public development of power is one which should give commanding weight to his point of view on the whole question of public power during the entire time that he continues to serve in this body, which I hope will be many years.

Mr. President, Senators opposing the treaty cannot fetter the great producing and consuming region in the Middle West, block off its natural highway to the sea, and divert its commerce to a few favored ports. They cannot get the mass of the people of this country in any section or in any State to support a policy based on grasping, greedy special interests. The opponents cannot make the criminal waste of a great natural resource popular. They cannot revive the spirit of sectionalism in this country without destroying the political party for which they speak and without blasting the future progress of this Nation.

President Roosevelt knows this to be true. Against the bitter opposition of the party leaders and of the servile agents of the Power Trust, he firmly established, as Governor of New York, a public project for the development of the St. Lawrence. He had the vision to see that this development, though it did not lend itself to exploitation for private profit, would benefit every producer and consumer in the Nation.

The seaway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic will be completed; the St. Lawrence power now running to waste, spending the force of an army of 5,000,000 men, will be harnessed; and this treaty will be ratified.

Mr. DIETERICH obtained the floor.

[Mr. DIETERICH addressed the Senate. After having spoken for about 1 hour and 30 minutes, he yielded the floor for the day. His speech is published entire on p. 1739.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Illinois would like to suspend his remarks, particularly in view of the fact that some days ago the Senate entered into an agreement to take up this afternoon a nomination pending on the Executive Calendar, being that of George C. Mathews to be a member of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. DIETERICH. It is entirely agreeable to yield the floor at this time, and I will continue my remarks tomorrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H.J.Res. 250) to provide appropriations to carry into effect the act entitled "An act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia", approved January 24, 1934, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

As in legislative session,

The joint resolution (H.J.Res. 250) to provide appropriations to carry into effect the act entitled "An act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia", approved January 24, 1934, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CONSIDERATION OF EXECUTIVE BUSINESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, as I said a few moments ago, there is an agreement to proceed to the consideration of the nomination of George C. Mathews to be a member of the Federal Trade Commission. The Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] is on his way to the Chamber, I am informed, and I suggest that the Senate proceed to carry out that agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The Senate is now proceeding in executive session.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably the following nominations:

Jefferson Caffery, of Louisiana, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Cuba; and Cyril L. F. Thiel, of Illinois, now a Foreign Service officer of class 8 and consul, to be also a secretary in the Diplomatic Service of the United States of America.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. BAILEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, reported favorably the nomination of Patrick J. Keohane, of Arizona, to be register of the land office at Phoenix, Arizona, vice Henry A. Morgan.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the calendar.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF OHIO

Mr. ASHURST. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report favorably the nomination of George J. Keinath to be United States marshal for the northern district of Ohio. I invite the attention of the junior Senator from Ohio to the nomination.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, some 2 or 3 weeks ago the marshal for the northern district of Ohio unexpectedly resigned, making his resignation effective January 31. The Department of Justice is anxious to have the new marshal ready to undertake his duties tomorrow. The nomination came from the White House yesterday; the Judiciary Committee has now favorably reported it, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I happen to know the nominee very well, and I hope that the request of the junior Senator from Ohio will be granted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, under the circumstances, I ask unanimous consent that the President may be notified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

RECOMMITTAL OF NOMINATION

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I call attention to Calendar No. 194, being the nomination of Edward A. Tigner to be postmaster at Milledgeville, Ga. At the request of the Representative in Congress from that district, and also the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], I ask that the nomination be recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nomination will be recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSIONER—GEORGE C. MATHEWS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the nomination, the consideration of which, under the unanimous consent agreement, is now in order.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of George C. Mathews, of Wisconsin, to be Federal Trade Commissioner for the remainder of the term expiring September 25, 1938.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, when this nomination came before the committee, the question whether the vacancy had been legally created was considered. The committee did not determine that that was a question for it to decide. It was suggested by the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH] that the only thing the committee had before it was the fitness of the candidate and not whether the vacancy had legally been created. I am somewhat under the impression that that position is correct; and if I could know that it would be generally understood that the Senate in confirming this nominee is not acting upon the question of the legality of the vacancy but rather upon the fitness of the candidate, I should have no objection at all. However, it raises a very important question, as must be obvious to everyone. The President sent this letter to Mr. Humphrey, who formerly filled the office to which Mr. Mathews has been appointed:

> Without any reflection at all upon you personally, or upon the service you have rendered in your present capacity, I find it necessary to ask for your resignation as a member of the Federal Trade Commission. I do this because I feel that the aims and purposes of the administration with respect to the work of the Commission can be carried out most effectively with personnel of my own selection.

In his second letter to Mr. Humphrey, the President stated:

> You will, I know, realize that I do not feel that your mind and my mind go along together on either the policies or the administering of the Federal Trade Commission, and, frankly, I think it is best for the people of this country that I should have a full confidence.

That is a very frank statement of the basis on which the vacancy was created by what might be called an Executive decree. It leaves open this question, How far can the Executive go in the removal of an appointee, especially an appointee of an independent commission?

I have no doubt whatever that the requirement of the consent of the Senate to a nomination does not imply that the President must get the Senate's consent to remove an officer whose nomination has been confirmed. I think that would be an erroneous conclusion. The Executive is the administrative officer of the Government, and his judgment must prevail as to the efficiency of the service of an appointee. Merely because a man nominated by the President cannot assume office without the consent of the Senate, it does not follow that the President cannot remove him without the consent of the Senate. Here, however, an entirely different case is presented. This is a case wherein an independent commission, not under the control of the President except as to the efficiency of the service rendered, a vacancy is created by the act of the President, who states that there is not any complaint as to the efficiency of the officer who is removed. Everyone must certainly concede that for malfeasance in office or inefficiency in office the President may remove; but where there is no charge of that kind, and it is so admitted, does the President's power extend to the extent of removal from office? If it does, would it be possible for the President, feeling that the Federal Reserve System is not being administered according to his own wishes, to declare all the members of the Federal Reserve Board to be inefficient and not to be going along with his mind, and therefore to declare their positions vacant and to appoint a new board? That is not a far-fetched supposition, and it is involved in this question.

The same thing might be said—although the two cases are not quite on a par—of the Comptroller General. He is an executive officer, speaking for the legislative department, created under the Budget legislation as the final judge as to the legality of the payment of bills under laws enacted. Congress was very jealous of its prerogatives when it came to enact Budget legislation and was anxious to avoid allowing the executive department to be its own auditor. So the legislative department provided for an auditor who was not to be in the executive department but was to be the spokesman of the legislative department, and Congress even specified that his removal could not be brought about without the form of an impeachment. Exercising his general constitutional authority of being responsible for the efficiency of appointive officers, could the President go to the extent, without cause, of removing the Comptroller General? The question is quite important; and when the matter came up, I had in mind what Lord Haldane calls "the mind of the legislators", which is always taken into consideration by the Supreme Court when it undertakes to arrive at the purpose of the legislators in an act passed by them.

I should not want our action today to be construed in a court where this case is to be settled as being the judgment of the Senate as to the legality of the vacancy; and that is the reason, and the only reason, why I asked that the nomination be not confirmed until a statement might be made. I myself have no objection to the confirmation of the nomination, but I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some editorials on this particular subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The editorials are as follows:

THE HUMPHREY ISSUE

The issue raised by the refusal of William E. Humphrey to accept dismissal without cause from the Federal Trade Commission, at the hands of President Roosevelt, involves the continued independence of the quasi-judicial bodies Congress has created. It is a serious matter, likely to have consequences far more important than the personalities involved.

The language of the acts setting up the Trade Commission, the Tariff Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and other agencies clearly indicates that Congress intended to keep them free from Executive or partisan domination. It is provided, among other things, that not more than three members shall be of the same political party. They are made removable by the President, but only for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office.

If the President succeeds in his present attempt to remove Mr. Humphrey without specifying charges under the law, he will, in effect, make the terms of all the members subject to capricious curtailment and destroy the Commission's freedom from domination. It will then have no more real authority than an ordinary administrative unit of the executive establishment, and the indirect powers of the President's office will have been vastly enlarged. Much of the authority "to regulate commerce" bestowed upon Congress in the Constitution will have been absorbed by the rival establishment centered in the White House.

Such a prospect stirs Democratic spokesmen as well as Republicans to distinct unease. The Baltimore Sun, for instance, terms it

"an attempt to establish a dangerous precedent", while the New York Times, in discussing the legal background, expresses regret that Chief Justice Taft, of the Supreme Court, in 1926 "went rather far out of his way" in the case of Myers v. The United States to bestow an advance blessing upon an act somewhat like the one President Roosevelt now has taken.

The decision in the Myers case upheld President Wilson's right to remove a postmaster without consulting the Senate. Postmasters are purely administrative officers, but the Chief Justice added:

"There may be duties of a quasi judicial character imposed upon executive officers and members of executive tribunals whose decisions after hearing affect interests of individuals, the discharge of which in a particular case the President cannot properly influence or control. But in such a case he may consider the decision as a reason for removing the officer on the ground that the discretion regularly entrusted to the officer by statute has not been, on the whole, intelligently or wisely exercised."

This, however, is not the law, it is merely the Chief Justice's obiter dictum. And many will agree with the Times that in advancing such a suggestion "the former President may be thought unconsciously to have influenced the judge.

HUMPHREY STANDS PAT

William E. Humphrey is not only within his rights but is doing a good service to his party and to the country when he refuses to resign from the Federal Trade Commission at the request of the President. The Commission was created September 26, 1914, in the Wilson administration, and the law specifically provides that no more than 3 of the 5 members shall be of the same political party. The intention was to keep it from becoming a partisan subsidiary, such as the President would make of it.

The Commissioners are named for 7 years. Their terms expire so as to make sure that there shall always be at least four experienced members. The Commission has been functioning almost exactly 19 years, during which it has investigated a multitude of complaints of unfair and unlawful tactics in business activities. Its work has been highly satisfactory, and it has been neither accused nor suspected of figuring in partisan politics.

Mr. Humphrey has been on the Commission since 1925, and his term does not expire until 1937. The President would have to appoint another Republican if Mr. Humphrey resigns, and is reported as having Philip La Follette, of Wisconsin, picked for the place. The President, in his request to Mr. Humphrey, explained that he feels his policies could be carried out better by a Republican of his own choosing.

The appointment of La Follette as a Republican would be a farce and subterfuge. The law contemplates that the Republican and Democratic Parties shall be represented on the Commission, and the spirit as well as the letter of the law should be observed. La Follette is no more representative of the Republican Party than is Brookhart, who is now serving as the President's contact man in dealing with Soviet Russian trade representatives.

Mr. Humphrey is a born Hoosier. He was educated at Wabash College and practiced law in Crawfordsville before going out to Seattle in 1893. He served in Congress from Washington and is a thoroughgoing representative of the Republican Party on the Trade Commission, such as the law provides the party should have. Ours is a two-party Government, and that fact should not be overlooked even in these times. The minority is entitled to members on the Trade Commission. They are not there, under the intent of the law, to enable a President of either political party to carry out his policies unhampered but to act as a balance wheel of opposition. Commissioner Humphrey is right when he declines to step aside for a puppet bearing a Republican label.

BEHIND THE HUMPHREY CASE

A suit filed in the Court of Claims by William E. Humphrey is expected ultimately to bring from the Supreme Court a decision as to whether or not the President has authority to remove members of quasi-judicial, independent Federal commissions because they may disagree with his policies. The case may thus be of the utmost importance in determining the future status of these bipartisan bodies.

President Roosevelt asked Mr. Humphrey to resign from the Federal Trade Commission because he felt that its work "can be carried out more effectively with the personnel of my own selection." No specific charges were made against the Commissioner and his request for a hearing was not granted. When he refused on several occasions to resign, he was arbitrarily removed by Executive order.

The differences in the viewpoints of President Roosevelt and Mr. Humphrey are extraneous to the issue. So in regard to the principle involved, are the merits of the latter as a member of the Federal Trade Commission. The broad question which the Supreme Court will be asked to decide is the right of the President to disrupt bipartisan commissions by dismissing members who belong to the party out of office.

Congress provided long terms for members of the Federal Trade Commission and similar bodies to foster independent judgment. Membership of the Commission was divided on party lines so that both the Republican and Democratic viewpoints would be represented. Yet President Roosevelt ousted a Republican member because, to use his own words, "I do not feel that your mind and my mind go along together on either the policies or the administering of the Federal Trade Commission."

At least one other Commissioner has been removed from office on the same principle. If this policy is to be carried out further, the independence of the quasi-judicial bodies will be ended and their usefulness may be seriously impaired.

[From the Republic-Bulletin, Oct. 16, 1933]

AN OPENING FOR POLITICS

Perhaps no action which President Roosevelt has taken in many weeks will turn out to be of more political importance than the removal of William E. Humphrey as a Republican member of the Federal Trade Commission. Mr. Humphrey, it is understood, will contest his removal in the courts on the ground that the Commission is a semi-independent body and that the law creating it provides only for the removal of a member from office because of malfeasance or incompetency. That neither of these charges applies to Mr. Humphrey can be gathered by the fact that when the President first called on the Commissioner to resign, he added to his request that it was being made "without any reflection upon you at all personally or upon the service you have rendered", and added: "I congratulate you upon your long and active service."

But, aside from the legal phase of the question, this change in the personnel of the Federal Trade Commission will have political importance in that it will give the Republican leaders a chance to state that the political "honeymoon" is over and that it was ended not by themselves but by the President himself. The Federal Trade Commission has always been regarded as a nonpartisan institution, and during three Republican administrations as many Democrats were carried on the pay roll as Republicans. Commissioner Humphrey was reappointed by President Hoover late in his term, and the appointment was confirmed by a Democratic Senate. The Republicans will now have the opportunity to charge that the Federal Trade Commission is to be converted to partisan uses. Already it is being alleged that politics has crept into the new securities division and that of 50 appointments made in that department, all have been Democrats in spite of the traditional nonpartisanship of the Commission. This is why, the Republicans will say, it was necessary to get rid of Mr. Humphrey, an old-time Republican, so that the entire Commission could be reorganized to function on a partisan basis.

Ever since the national recovery drive was put into effect it has been emphasized in high places that it is a nonpartisan attack on the depression. The same methods of putting it over have been used as were employed during the World War. Rumor in Washington now is to the effect that the administration of the N.R.A. is to be finally lodged in the Federal Trade Commission. Republican leaders are doubtless getting ready to say that the Federal Trade Commission is to be reorganized on a Democratic basis to get it ready for Democratic control of the N.R.A. and the important codes under it.

No matter how much or how little there is in these charges it is undoubtedly a fact that the administration in removing Mr. Humphrey has given the Republicans a good opening. They can now go into battle with a perfectly good excuse—that the administration donned the political armor first.

But aside from these political angles to the situation there is a deeper and more serious side. It is well summed up by the independent Washington Star in the following words:

"The attack upon the independence of the Trade Commission by the Chief Executive in the removal of Mr. Humphrey is a serious matter. If the decisions of the Commission in important matters relating to the conduct of business, placed in the hands of the Commission by law, are to be dictated from the White House, there may be trouble ahead. Such an attack will be regarded in much the same light as an attack upon the judiciary by the Executive. Federal judges hold their appointments 'during good behavior' under the terms of the Constitution. It has been held they are only removable after impeachment and trial by the Senate. The President and all civil officers of the Government also may be removed after impeachment proceedings as a matter of fact. But the Congress, in passing its laws setting up various Government agencies, has recognized the right of the President to remove civil officers—outside of the judiciary—for cause."

[From the Baltimore Sun (Democratic)]

THE ONE OBJECTION

When President Coolidge wanted to influence the findings of one of the semijudicial commissions, he was accustomed to resort to devious means. If he wanted to hold a bludgeon over a commissioner's head, he suggested that the man furnish him with an undated resignation. If he wanted to get rid of a commissioner entirely, he found a convenient post at Bucharest or Santiago into which the unruly member could be discreetly eased. For President Roosevelt's method, as exemplified in the removal of William E. Humphrey from the Federal Trade Commission, it may at least be said that it is open and direct.

Mr. Roosevelt does not think Mr. Humphrey is in sympathy with the policies of the new administration. He wants to get him out of office and he says so in a forthright manner. There is no beating about the bush, after the manner of Mr. Coolidge in the once-famous case of William E. Culbertson, and for this fort-rightness we ought to be grateful. It at least permits us to know what is going on and to see the practices of government in actual operation. An important issue is involved in this controversy, and it is better to have this issue thrashed out in the open than behind the old obscurities.

It is unfortunate that the issue is joined over Mr. Humphrey. The man President Roosevelt has chosen to oust is hardly the man most of us would like to keep on a commission charged with the new responsibilities that devolve on the Trade Commission. He is the spokesman of the Bourbon tradition that business can do no wrong. He is the conservative thorn in the flesh of progressive members eager to move the Trade Commission toward the goal of greater usefulness. There are a thousand reasons why he ought not to be on the Commission, and only one reason for his continuance there. Yet that one reason is worth weighing, for it involves the independence of the Commission on which Mr. Humphrey has been serving.

When the Trade Commission was established in 1914, it was organized as a continuing body, the term of one commissioner expiring every year. It was also organized as a nonpartisan body, the law for its creation specifying that not more than three members should be members of the same political party. Members once appointed were removable by the President, but only for "inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office." The purpose of these provisions was to create a semijudicial body such as the Tariff Commission has been in theory and such as the Interstate Commerce Commission has been in both theory and practice.

By removing Mr. Humphrey without specifying charges under the law, President Roosevelt has struck at this independence. If such action is permissible, the Trade Commission will cease to be the continuing body Congress intended, for the terms of its members will be terminable at the will of the President. If disagreement with the President's policies is a valid ground for removal—and this is the only ground on which Mr. Roosevelt bases his case—then the Trade Commission will be subject to reorganization with every change of administration and it will cease to be an independent, quasi-judicial body and become one of the administrative agencies of the Government.

It may be argued that the new Securities Act with the administration of which the Trade Commission is charged so enlarges the authority of the Commission as to make such reorganization essential. Some grounds for this contention exist, but the fact is that neither the administration, which drafted the act, nor the Congress, which passed it, provided for such a change. The enforcement of the securities law was intrusted to the Trade Commission as the Trade Commission then stood. If this was an oversight, it could be remedied by appropriate legislation at the next session of Congress. To attempt a remedy by administrative fiat is to risk the establishment of a dangerous precedent.

HIGH-HANDED

The President's summary dismissal of Mr. William E. Humphrey from the Federal Trade Commission seems both high-handed and contrary to the spirit of the law. We are glad Mr. Humphrey has decided to have the courts pass upon its legality, for none of the precedents informally cited to sustain it seems entirely applicable.

The statute is similar to many covering the establishment of so-called "bipartisan commissions." It provides that not more than 3 of the 5 members shall belong to the dominant party. The idea back of that provision is that there shall not only be minority party representation but a division of thought on controversial subjects. This is particularly important at this time, when the Federal Trade Commission is entering upon the administration of the Federal Securities Act, about which there is so much difference of opinion.

Mr. Humphrey was a conservative when first appointed in 1925 and has represented that school of thought through the intervening years. Evidently the President is seeking to force a commission agreeing completely with his own economic theories—in other words, he wants a "rubber stamp" instead of a deliberative and quasi-judicial body. If the courts uphold him in this, there would seem to be no lengths to which he may not go in bending the processes of government to meet his will.

HUMPHREY STANDS PAT

In his attempt to oust William E. Humphrey from the Federal Trade Commission, President Roosevelt regards bipartisan regulative commissions as instruments of administrative policy, equally subject to political control with the various departments and bureaus. When Congress provided that the minority party should be represented, that terms of Commissioners should overlap, and that Commissioners might be removed by the President "for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office", it excluded all other reasons for removal. The only reason given by the President is that "I do not feel that your mind and mine go along together on either the policies or the administering of the Federal Trade Commission."

In passing the Federal Trade Commission Act Congress did not contemplate that the minds of the President and the Commissioners, especially those of the party opposed to the President, should go along together. It delegated to that Commission, as to the Interstate Commerce, Tariff, and Federal Power Commissions, certain legislative powers. Exercise of those powers is semijudicial, therefore precludes consideration of administration policies. Congress intended that the Commission should be independent of the administration in reaching its decisions.

This is not the first occasion on which a President has undertaken to break down the independence of a commission and to subject it to control. In appointing the Tariff Commission, President Wilson appointed the minority members of the Progressive Party, which was more nearly of his mind than was the Republican Party, and only as vacancies occurred under succeeding Republican Presidents did Republicans again win places. Congress itself has not been guiltless of attempts to break down the independence of commissions, for a Senate committee grilled members of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the decision in the Lake Coal Rate case, but the Commissioners stood their ground and an attempt to prevent confirmation of one of them on reappointment failed.

Importance of the Federal Trade Commission has been enhanced by the Industrial Recovery and the Securities Acts. The former law exempts industrial codes from the antitrust laws, which the Commission administers, and provides that violation of standards of fair competition established by codes "shall be deemed an unfair method of competition in commerce within the meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act", and that the act may not be construed "to impair the powers of" the Commission. Under the Securities Act no securities, domestic or foreign, may be offered for sale without license from the Commission, which may be withdrawn. Apparently the President wishes these new, extensive powers to be exercised in harmony with his policies.

Mr. Humphrey's firm stand suggests that he is prepared to contest in court the President's power to remove him. Such power has been upheld by the Supreme Court as to offices in the executive departments, the most recent decision having been in the case of ex-Postmaster Myers, of Portland. But appointments to semijudicial commissions are in a different class. They exercise legislative power delegated by Congress, which has limited the President's power of removal to specific causes.

[From the Washington Post (Republican), Nov. 2, 1933]

INDEPENDENT COMMISSIONS

Two members of Federal bipartisan commissions recently have been involuntarily retired from their positions by Presidential action. In one case a legal fight is contemplated. In the other the Commissioner has stepped out at the request of the White House without any attempt to thwart the desire of the President to name a representative of his own choosing to this post.

Only the courts can decide the extent of the President's power to remove members of the independent commissions where no specific charges are made. But the practice of ousting from bipartisan commissions members who represent the opposition party merely because their views do not run in channels approved by the White House is a matter of policy that is of vital concern to the public. It involves the very character of these independent, bipartisan bodies set up by Congress to exercise specific functions.

These two dismissals are certain to produce reactions among the members of the independent, bipartisan commissions. Men chosen to these positions are human. Most of them doubtless wish to hold their jobs. Perhaps a majority of them are strong enough to maintain their points of view in spite of constant fear that they may be asked to resign. Nevertheless, the effect of this unexpressed threat, hanging like the sword of Damocles over their heads, is bound to be demoralizing. Can commissioners be expected vigorously to uphold principles which they believe to be right when their fellow members are being ousted from their jobs for similar conduct?

It is obvious that the disruption of these quasi-judicial bodies tends to destroy their usefulness. Congress specifically provided long terms for members of the Federal Trade Commission, the Tariff Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Power Commission, etc., to avoid a change of personnel with each incoming administration, and thus to strengthen the independence of these bodies. If these terms are to end at the discretion of the President, that purpose will be frustrated and the quasi-judicial bodies will become agencies of whatever administration happens to be in power.

When Congress reassembles, a vigorous protest against this handicap which has been placed on the bipartisan and independent commissions may be expected.

[From New York Herald Tribune (Republican), Sept. 21, 1933]

NO RUBBER STAMPS

It seems incredible to think that President Roosevelt, after more mature consideration of all it involves, will go ahead with his present intention of forcing Mr. William E. Humphrey out of the Federal Trade Commission. It would be too flagrant admission of a desire to reduce all of the quasi-judicial establishments in Washington to the status of rubber stamps.

It would seem fair to assume that when Congress in 1914 declared that in the Federal Trade Board of five "not more than three of the commissioners shall be members of the same political party", it meant to provide a minority point of view different from that of the administration at any particular time. That Commissioner Humphrey's economic or social ideas may differ from those of President Roosevelt and a majority of his commissioners should be no cause for getting rid of him. Rather should it be a reason for retaining him, if, as reported, the President finds no criticism of him personally or of his work.

Commissioner Humphrey is frankly a conservative and always has been—during his service in Congress, 1903–17, and since his first appointment to the Federal Trade Commission in 1925. At that time his confirmation was strenuously opposed by such progressive Republicans as Senators LA FOLLETTE, NORRIS, WHEELER, and others. When his name came up for reconfirmation last January, Senator HUEY LONG was one of the few who made much of a fuss. Apparently there was nothing in his record his enemies could put their hands on except consistent conservatism. He once summed up his philosophy by saying he did not believe success a crime or failure a virtue, that wealth was presumptively wrong or poverty presumptively right, that honesty and brains in industry should be penalized, or extravagance and inefficiency glorified.

According to report the President wishes to replace Commissioner Humphrey by former Governor Philip La Follette, of Wisconsin, who supported the Democratic ticket in 1932. We doubt whether such a substitution would fulfill either the letter or the spirit of the law. We think it wise to have minority opinion in such a body as the Federal Trade Commission at all times. Particularly is this true now in view of its new duties in the administration of the highly important Federal Securities Act.

A PRINCIPLE INVOLVED

In his refusal to comply with President Roosevelt's request for his resignation as Federal Trade Commissioner, Will E. Humphrey, of Seattle, seems to be within his rights. His interpretation of the law governing his case is sustained by the sound opinion of Republican Senators. Should the President now attempt to force him out, a serious question would be raised, and the case probably would be subject to court review.

Only hasty thinkers will ascribe Mr. Humphrey's attitude to obstinacy or desire to hold the job. There is a principle involved quite apart from and far more important than his personal interest in the matter. In this, as in other bipartisan commissions, the law provides that not more than a bare majority of the members shall be of the same political party. The obvious intent is to maintain not necessarily a hostile but at least a critical minority membership.

The term "bipartisan" used to cover the ground quite fully. It doesn't any more. In this case, for instance, the President would have to appoint a nominal Republican as Mr. Humphrey's successor. Republicans nowadays come in all sorts and sizes. The very natural inclination of the President would be to appoint one of the many who are in sympathy with the policies of his administration. That would contradict the purpose of the bipartisan set-up, which is meant to prevent the suppression of minority opinion.

It can be of no personal advantage to Mr. Humphrey to hang on to a job under an administration that seeks to be rid of him. In the present instance he is acting under the advice of Republican Senate leaders, the object being to test the security of the law creating the Federal Trade Commission.

[From the Baltimore Sun (Democratic), Sept. 19, 1933]

A TIMELY CHALLENGE

It is perhaps impossible for any one of the so-called "independent commissions" of the Government to remain rigidly independent of the appointing power. That power of necessity resides in the Presidency. And it is asking too much of human nature to expect men who have received appointment or who may seek reappointment at the hands of the Chief Executive always to ignore his wishes or completely to resist his influence.

For that reason, such bodies as the Federal Trade Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the United States Tariff Commission are not literally free agencies. In theory they so function. In practice their policy may be and often is determined by the will of the White House.

No one can doubt that Presidents Coolidge and Hoover, for example, controlled in large measure the conclusions of the Tariff Commission during their administrations. President Hoover's domination of the Wickersham Commission was a notorious fact, as was his exercise of power over the activities of the Shipping Board. President Roosevelt has dictated the action of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation from the beginning of his regime.

The Federal Trade Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission have been somewhat freer of Executive interference in the past than some of the other bodies. In the case of the former, that part of its work other than the utilities investigation long ago degenerated into dull routine and so remained until the Securities Publicity Act was passed. The Interstate Commerce Commission somehow had maintained an untouchable air as it went its way.

In virtually demanding the resignation of William E. Humphrey as a member of the Federal Trade Commission, President Roosevelt has further encroached upon the supposed freedom of the independent commissions. To his credit it must be said that he has done this openly and for the avowed purpose of reorganizing that board. He did not emulate the late Mr. Coolidge, who sought to exact of David J. Lewis an undated resignation as the price of a reappointment on the Tariff Commission.

In the present instance Mr. Humphrey has challenged the President's right to remove him from the commission in the absence of specific charges. The commissioner, who is one of the two Republican members of this bipartisan body, and perhaps the most reactionary member of it since its creation, was reappointed by President Hoover more than a year ago for a 7-year term and was confirmed by the Senate.

It is the commissioner's contention that he can only be forced out of office for incompetency, manifest neglect of duty, or malfeasance in the discharge of that duty. No complaint is publicly made by the President touching Mr. Humphrey's official conduct.

The fate of Mr. Humphrey, as an "ex parte" proposition, is not a matter of public interest. He has not been one of his commission's ornaments or assets. But the power of the President to reorganize the independent commissions at will in order to enforce his political policies is a matter of proper concern. If he can require Mr. Humphrey to resign without proving or even asserting charges against the official, he may require any or all the Interstate Commerce Commissioners to do the same, or any or all the members of the Civil Service Commission, or any other similar body.

Future Presidents might take the same line, with the result that with each change of a national administration there would be sweeping changes in the personnel of all the independent commissions. This would mean that a continuing policy in the matter of railroad regulation, for example, would be impossible. The commissions would be politicalized in exactly the same sense as are the executive departments of the Government.

[From New York Times (Democratic), Sept. 20, 1933]

THE POWER OF REMOVAL

Few are the Presidents who have avoided a controversy over their power to appoint and remove Federal officials. President Wilson won a posthumous victory when the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Myers case, recognized his right to remove executive officers without the consent of the Senate which confirmed them. President Coolidge stirred the ancient embers when, as a condition to the reappointment of a member of the Tariff Commission, he asked that gentleman for his undated resignation. President Hoover emerged triumphant from a quarrel with the Senate when the Supreme Court refused to allow that jealous body to withdraw its consent to the nomination of George Otis Smith as a member of the Federal Power Commission after he had been actually appointed to that office. Now, Mr. Humphrey, a Republican member of the Federal Trade Commission, enters the historic lists with a refusal, on constitutional grounds, to accede to President Roosevelt's request for his resignation.

The President, it is reported, wished to put in Mr. Humphrey's place Philip La Follette, a Progressive Republican, presumably more in sympathy with his own views as to the proper functioning of the Trade Board. Mr. Humphrey protests that it is a "continuing and independent body not under Presidential control", and that under the law a Commissioner may be removed only for wrongdoing or inefficiency, neither of which has been charged in his case. The President will doubtless rely on the majority opinion in the Myers case, in which Chief Justice Taft went out of his way to include even such quasi-judicial bodies as this in the scope of a determination which, as an ex-President, he no doubt deemed not only sound in law but essential to the proper exercise of executive authority and discretion. The President, he held, "must place in each member of his official family and his chief executive subordinates implicit faith." The moment he loses confidence in any one of them he "must have the power to remove them without delay." But that is not all: There may be duties of a quasi-judicial character imposed on executive officers and members of executive tribunals whose decisions after hearing affect interests of individuals, the discharge of which the President cannot in a particular case properly influence or control. But even in such a case he may consider the decision after its rendition as a reason for removing the officer, on the ground that the discretion regularly entrusted to that officer by statute has not been on the whole intelligently or wisely exercised. Otherwise, he does not discharge his own constitutional duty of seeing that the laws be faithfully executed. That doctrine has been widely challenged, however. Thus Professor Corwin, of Prinecton, contends that the scope of the President's power of removal may vary with the nature of the office. He thinks that members of quasi-judicial bodies like the Interstate Commerce Commission fall in a different category from ordinary executive officers. Their powers are not a subtraction from Presidential prerogative, "but are, on the contrary, derived from a delegation by Congress of its own express constitutional powers." How is independence of decision, he asks, "to be reasonably predicated of an officer over whose head the Damocles sword of removal is ever suspended"?

THE HUMPHREY REMOVAL

President Roosevelt's ouster of William E. Humphrey from membership in the Federal Trade Commission without preferring charges of incompetence, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office has raised two questions. The first is the power of the President to remove an official without regard to the terms of the act of Congress providing for his appointment and removal. The second is the wisdom of an attack upon the independence of a commission set up by Congress to act in a judicial capacity; in other words, the wisdom of having such a judicial commission "packed" with members who believe as does the President and presumably will take orders from him.

The Federal Trade Commission was created by law at the urgent recommendation of the late President Woodrow Wilson. It was hailed as the instrument which would henceforth make impossible unfair practices in business and industry. It was set up, as far as possible, as a nonpartisan and independent and judicial commission, provision being made that not more than three of its five members should belong to the same political party. In the law creating the commission it was specified that removal from office should be for one or more of three causes—incompetence, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. Presumably, since Congress had fixed these causes, removal was to be limited to them. President Roosevelt has not charged Mr. Humphrey with incompetence, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. Indeed, when he first requested the resignation of Mr. Humphrey the President wrote a flattering letter.

Had the President, instead of complimenting Mr. Humphrey on his long service, merely written him that he was removed because of incompetence, he would have been entirely within the law from any point of view. Apparently the President has foreclosed his right to make charges against Humphrey by his early letter to him, unless he should now advance the suggestion that later information has shown that Humphrey was incompetent or neglectful of duty. But such a course would invite public criticism.

The question at law which apparently presents itself is whether the Congress had the right, in passing the Federal Trade Commission Act, to curtail in any manner the power of removal from office belonging to the President. The constitutionality of that part of the Trade Commission Act relating to removals for cause might be called into question. The Constitution, while it gives the President power to appoint officers of the United States Government, makes no specific mention of removal from office. In practice and in court decisions, however, the power of removal has been held to be the proper corollary of the appointing power. Since the Government was established there have been constantly recurring disputes between the President and the Senate over the power of removal from office, when appointments were made by the President and confirmed by the Senate. One of the most famous battles of the kind was over the removal from office of the then Secretary of War Stanton by President Andrew Johnson, leading to impeachment proceedings against Johnson.

The attack upon the independence of the Trade Commission by the Chief Executive in the removal of Mr. Humphrey is a serious matter. If the decisions of the Commission in important matters relating to the conduct of business, placed in the hands of the commission by law, are to be dictated from the White House, there may be trouble ahead. Such an attack will be regarded in much the same light as an attack upon the judiciary by the Executive. Federal judges hold their appointments during good behavior under the terms of the Constitution. It has been held they are only removable after impeachment and trial by the Senate. The President and all civil officers of the Government also may be removed after impeachment proceedings, as a matter of fact. But the Congress, in passing its laws setting up various Government agencies, has recognized the right of the President to remove civil officers—outside of the judiciary—for cause.

THE PRESIDENT'S POWER OF REMOVAL

In July President Roosevelt asked Mr. William E. Humphrey, a Republican member of the Federal Trade Commission, to resign. The Commissioner, appointed by Mr. Hoover, had served but 2 years of a term of 7. In the polite correspondence that followed Mr. Roosevelt's request it appeared that it was not intended as a reflection upon the commissioner's past service. The President felt that the policies of the administration with reference to the work of the Trade Commission could "be carried out most effectively with personnel of my own selection."

Mr. Humphrey pointed out that Congress meant the Commission to be an "independent, semijudicial body", and that the statute creating it provided that a Commissioner "may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office." He knew that the President had unrestrained powers to remove postmasters. There was no such decision in regard to the statute establishing the Trade Commission. On Saturday Mr. Roosevelt removed Mr. Humphrey. The latter will contest the removal, presumably by suing the Comptroller General for his salary, or otherwise.

So the great case of the Oregon postmaster, Myers v. the United States, decided in 1926 after having been 2 years before the Court and twice argued before a majority opinion could be reached, will come up for clarification. Chief Justice Taft delivered the opinion, an enormously long and learned document, in which at times the former President may be thought unconsciously to have influenced the judge. Without trusting himself to that sea of argument, it is enough for the layman to remember that President Wilson's right, without the consultation of the Senate, prescribed by the act of Congress, to remove a postmaster was sustained. The Court ruled that the constitutional power to remove an executive officer appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is solely the President's; nor can Congress confer upon the Senate a share in that power. Further—and here is where the shoe pinches—since the President has the sole constitutional power to remove executive officers, he may remove them at his discretion.

Associate Justices McReynolds, Brandeis, and Holmes dissented. Professor Corwin, of Princeton, wrote a closely reasoned little book whose thesis is that "the essential nature of the office under consideration, as shown by its characteristic duties, determines the scope of the removal power in relation to the power of Congress in creating an office to fix its tenure." Quasi-judicial bodies and administrative commissions must be protected in their independence and kept free from political manipulation. Chief Justice Taft went rather far out of his way when he said:

"Then there may be duties of a quasi-judicial character imposed on executive officers and members of executive tribunals whose decisions after hearing affect interests of individuals, the discharge of which the President cannot in a particular case properly influence or control. But even in such a case he may consider the decision as a reason for removing the officer on the ground that the discretion regularly intrusted to that officer by statute has not been on the whole intelligently or wisely exercised. Otherwise he does not discharge his own constitutional duty of seeing that the laws be faithfully executed."

For the moment, no great number of persons can be expected to break their heads over a constitutional question; but the Republicans in Congress and, it may be, a lot of Democrats, if patronage continues to be dispensed with the speed of cold molasses, may be depended on to catch the proper fervor.

[From Philadelphia Ledger (Independent) Oct. 9, 1933]

WITHOUT CHARGES

President Roosevelt's action in removing Mr. William E. Humphrey, a Republican, from the Federal Trade Commission and appointing Mr. George C. Matthews, of Wisconsin, another Republican, in his stead, involves a question of propriety, if not of legality. The law prescribes that not more than three of the members shall be of the same political party. It provides also that a member may be removed for "inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office." No charges have been made against Mr. Humphrey by Mr. Roosevelt, who says merely that their minds are not in accord "on either the policies or the administering of the Federal Trade Commission."

A Supreme Court decision upholding President Wilson's removal of a postmaster without charges has been cited in this connection. It was then held that a President may remove an appointee even when he has been confirmed by the Senate. The Federal Trade Commission has recently been intrusted with the administration of the important act of controlling the issue of securities. It is understood that the differences between Mr. Humphrey and the President arose over the policies to be pursued in this matter.

The issue raised by Mr. Roosevelt is not a new one. He is not the first President who has sought to control the actions of a commission through his powers of discharge and appointment. Mr. Humphrey contemplates legal action. But the highest court has been loath to circumscribe the powers of the Executive, although an interpretation of the law in this case would be of wide interest.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I was present at the committee meeting when this matter was considered. I think one may very well question whether we ought to try to object to what has been done by the President by refusing to confirm the man appointed to succeed the one who was removed, for it has always seemed to me, in connection with the question of confirmation, that the sole question which the Senate can properly ask itself and consider is whether the man who is selected is a fit person for the office. No one, so far as I know, has questioned the fitness of the appointee for the office and therefore I feel a great hesitancy about voting against the confirmation of the man who has been appointed.

I desire, however, to call attention to the fact that the removal of Mr. Humphrey in this case violates two principles laid down by the Congress when it created the Federal Trade Commission. It was distinctly provided that the Commission should be nonpartisan by using this language:

Not more than three of the Commissioners shall be members of the same political party.

In addition to that, a rather long term is provided, a term of 7 years, the idea of the Congress being that the Commission should not only be nonpartisan but that the person selected should be there long enough to be able to learn the work and to perform his duties better than some other person who might be there only a short time.

If the President may violate one of these principles by removing a man who does not agree, as the President believes, with his policy, then he destroys the very purpose of that provision of the act. The very purpose of Congress was to have a minority on the Commission who could not be controlled by the President.

If it be true that the President may at his pleasure remove any one of them he sees fit to remove, he may keep on doing that until he gets a commission that he can control and that will do exactly what he asks them to do.

The Congress distinctly provided that the Commissioners might be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. Mr. Humphrey is not charged with any of those things; but, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] just stated by reading it into the RECORD, the letter written by the President shows distinctly that Mr. Humphrey was not guilty of any of those particular things.

I think the Senate at this time has a duty to itself to perform. I think we ought not casually to overlook this violation of the intent of Congress by this action of the President. It is true that the ultimate place where the question must be decided is in the courts; but I think we ought to do more than register a protest in the Senate. I think we ought to do what the Senate has done before. I refer particularly to the George Otis Smith case, in which the Senate selected its own counsel to present the matter to the courts in order that it might protect itself. The George Otis Smith case was not nearly so important as is this, because in that instance the Senate could protect itself merely by refusing to notify the President until the time for reconsideration had passed. But here there is no opportunity for the Senate to protect itself. We may in the future enact legislation containing a similar provision, but unless this challenge should be sustained by the Supreme Court it would be useless hereafter to write such a provision in any law.

So, Mr. President, while I am not going to object to the confirmation at this time, I do offer to the Senate a resolution requesting that the Interstate Commerce Committee be authorized to select counsel to represent the Senate when this case reaches the courts. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolution (S.Res. 163) was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Committee be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to employ counsel to appear before the Supreme Court on behalf of the Senate in any action that may be brought before that Court by William E. Humphrey for the purpose of testing the right of the President to remove a member of the Federal Trade Commission for any reason except that stated in the statute.

Further resolved, That there be appropriated out of the contingent fund of the Senate a sum not to exceed $2,500 to pay for the services of such counsel.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, so far as I know, there is no objection to Mr. Mathews from the standpoint of his fitness or his qualifications for the office. The discussion in the committee and on the floor turned on the point of whether or not Mr. Humphrey's legal rights would be in any way weakened by the action of the Senate in confirming the nomination of his successor. I think it was the unanimous judgment of the committee that such action was not intended in any way to affect that question, and that it should be understood that the Senate, by confirming Mr. Mathews, was in no way taking any side in the legal contest that is to be maintained before the court in the District of Columbia and eventually before the Supreme Court of the United States. Certainly none of us want to do anything to interfere in any way with the rights which may be involved.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 31, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Again, most merciful God, it is Thy everlasting love that draws with unfailing mercy. Out of it bursts the revelation of the eternal. O may it minister unto us the needed lessons of humility. Even allow it to reproach our feverish impatience and our fretful spirits. Blessed Father in Heaven, cleanse us and be the ministering power that makes for righteousness and breaks down the barriers of selfishness; may our hearts burn against all forms of injustice. Let Thy light fall upon our immortal souls that they may be like the dawn upon the hills of earth. We would unveil the cross and behold the mercies of God, the hopes of our land, and the joys which are to bless the children of time. O let Thy good come this way, the way of our country and the way of every man, until it falls like silver dewdrops from the heart of the All-father. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SALE OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution No. 250, to provide appropriations to carry into effect the act entitled "An act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia", approved January 24, 1934.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for carrying into effect the provisions of the act entitled "An act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia", approved January 24, 1934, there are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and payable from the revenues of the District of Columbia, the following sums, respectively:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Alcoholic Beverage Control Board: For personal services, rent, advertising, printing and binding, office equipment and supplies, street-car and bus transportation, telephone service, and other necessary contingent and miscellaneous expenses, $23,054.

Office of corporation counsel: For an additional amount for personal services, $3,613.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, the Budget estimate sent to the Committee on Appropriations was for $87,000 to cover the balance of this fiscal year and the next fiscal year.

This resolution carries only $26,667 to cover the balance of this fiscal year, leaving to the regular District of Columbia appropriation bill the amount for next year.

The importance of the passage of this resolution at this time is that this control is not effective until funds are provided and the District does not receive any revenue from the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors until the board created by the act of Congress to control liquor in the District gets into operation and issues licenses.

The salaries provided for are those specified in the statute: $5,000 each for each 3 commissioners, less the 15 percent; 1 secretary, $3,200, under the Classification Act; 8 inspectors at $2,300, under the Classification Act; 3 stenographers, 1 at $2,000 and 2 at $1,620; 1 typist, 1 bookkeeper, and 2 clerks at $1,400 each; and 1 messenger, all regulated by the schedule of the classified service, less the 15 percent.

Now, if there are any questions, I shall be pleased to try to answer them.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has provided all the President asked up to the 1st of July next.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No, not all; but we have supplied a sufficient amount to last until the end of this fiscal year.

Mr. BLANTON. What cuts have been made?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Only insofar as the 15 percent is concerned.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, the gentleman has supplied everything the President asked for the remainder of this fiscal year, less the 15 percent.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am interested, of course, in seeing this legislation passed so that the law we enacted governing the regulation and sale of liquor in the District of Columbia can be put into force at the earliest possible date.

I want to make a few remarks now in reference to the price of whisky. Are we going to permit those who hold warehouse receipts and control all the good liquor in this country to continue to charge exorbitant prices for it. If we do, we will not have disposed of the bootlegger; he will be in the picture more than he ever was. It will be a case of repealing the eighteenth amendment for the benefit of the bootlegger.

Just think of it! The cheapest liquor that can be bought by the man licensed to sell liquor in a hotel or restaurant in Washington is $68 a case in 10-case lots. At this rate they are not going to be able to sell a drink of liquor for less than 65 cents, and few of them will sell it at that price. What is the result? You can see the picture yourself. The people cannot pay such a price for liquor.

Now, I thought we might be able to reach this situation by a graduated tax, but I find that such a tax would be playing right into the hands of those who have this liquor. Those who hold this liquor are happy because they have declared a dividend, not a dividend in money but a dividend in whisky. The stockholders have parceled out whisky to themselves in the form of a dividend. They have that whisky and those stockholders living in Washington can bring it in here as soon as this law goes into effect. I understand if a high tax were placed on liquor which was sold above a certain price per gallon they would use the whisky for blending purposes. How are they blending whisky? They take a gallon of good whisky and make 4 gallons of rotten whisky out of it.

Now, Congress must do something if it is going to correct this situation. I am not talking at random. I know what I am talking about. I have investigated this. It does not apply only to the District of Columbia but it applies to the entire country and to my own city as well. I have an advertisement on my desk right now taken from a St. Louis newspaper of last Sunday's date which advertises liquor at outrageous prices too high for the average person to pay.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. LLOYD. Can the gentleman conceive any reason why there should have been such a sudden rise in the price of whisky from $27.50 a case to approximately $60? It was selling in the drug stores last April at $27.50, the same whisky taken from the same barrel.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I never knew they sold it for less than $32.50. I missed the $27.50 price.

Mr. LLOYD. Twenty-seven dollars and fifty cents a case was what they were charging for it last April.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am glad to see the gentleman has at last sided with me in the matter. He was opposed to my attempts to permit the Government to get some of these profits.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I do not think we can correct the situation by putting a tax of $6 a gallon on whisky because it would only be passed on to the consumer; but I was not opposed to the gentleman's investigation and I am not opposed to it now. There is a Whisky Trust in this country. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There is a Whisky Trust in Washington, with its tentacles reaching out everywhere. The prices were announced the other night.

Mr. Doran and his institute announced, it appears, that the lowest price was 10 times what they got before prohibition or what they are entitled to get, including tax and everything. In other words, they are mulcting the American people nine times an exorbitant profit. All I was in favor of doing was for the Government to take this profit in the way of a sales tax. Before prohibition they paid a sales tax of 50 percent. That is what it figured.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I only have 5 minutes. I do not agree with the gentleman that you can cure the situation in the way he advocates, because they will simply pass the excess tax on to the purchaser, which will make the price higher to the consumer. We can do something by passing laws that will permit the Government to control the blending of whisky and not permitting them to put stuff on the market that is worse than bootleg whisky. I think we have a duty to perform to protect the public.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. In order to keep the prices up they have a plan over in the A.A.A. to limit the number of distilleries that can get licenses.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That will not help. Whisky made today cannot be sold until it is 4 years old if placed in bond. It must remain in the Government warehouse 4 years. To permit the manufacture of an unlimited amount now would help 4 years from now. I want to get the price down now, and I say it is the duty of Congress to take action that will bring it down. We owe it to the public to act now. [Applause.]

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

GENERAL LAFAYETTE

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged report:

House Concurrent Resolution 26

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there is hereby established a special joint congressional committee to be composed of five Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, which shall make appropriate arrangements for the commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the death of General Lafayette, occurring on May 20, 1934.

SEC. 2. The committee shall select a chairman from among its members. Any vacancy occurring in the membership of the committee shall be filled in the manner in which the original appointment was made. The committee shall cease to exist upon making its report as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 3. The committee is authorized to accept and make use of contributions for carrying out the purposes of this resolution and shall file with the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives a report with respect to amounts so received and expended.

STATE, JUSTICE, THE JUDICIARY, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1935

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H.R. 7513) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice, and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 449), which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompany papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BACON reserved all points of order on the bill.

TAXATION AND THE PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, as a Republican Member of this House I have laid aside partisan considerations and tried sincerely to cooperate with the President in his efforts to restore prosperity, and I shall continue in that attitude while a Member of this House.

The President has asked for constructive suggestions from the minority, and I, therefore, desire to call attention to what I believe the most important subject which so vitally affects the American people, which is taxation.

There are certain tendencies in the recovery program that have me deeply worried. One of these tendencies is the tremendous expenditures of money. Last year the Congress authorized the spending of $11,500,000,000 of which approximately $4,000,000,000 was the annual current expenses, the rest being extraordinary expenses. This year the administration has asked for an additional $10,000,000,000 for the purpose of continuing the recovery program. This means an unheard of increase in our national debt, which was $25,482,034,419 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, reduced to $16,185,308,299, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and it is estimated that at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, it will be approximately $32,000,000,000.

Let us examine what this means to the individual. Today there is a public debt of $1,500 for every family in the United States and this has to be repaid.

The citizens are already groaning under a tax burden such as has caused the downfall of every great civilization that has preceded ours. Mr. Speaker, we are faced with one of two alternatives. We must either mortgage the future of our children and possibly our grandchildren or we will be forced to repudiate our honest obligations if we continue to follow the policy of borrowing and spending. This repudiation may take many forms, but the most likely means would be to make use of the printing press. No inflation has ever started in any way except by being controlled and no inflation has ever ended that way.

Unstable money means that commodity prices rise faster than the wage scale, and the standard of living falls at the same ratio as the value of money depreciates until the very people who were to be aided are the ones most injured.

Confronting the Seventy-third Congress, I believe, should be the adoption of a new financial program—a program that will assure the American people that our Government is not going to continue borrowing and spending and then be forced to repudiate its obligations. Instead of following such a course, let us adopt a program assuring our countrymen that we are going to stop borrowing and spending and start paying back to our citizens the money borrowed from them by our Government.

Mr. Speaker, I believe we are all in accord that we must bring about a policy that will give employment to the American men and women workers in industry and agriculture which will prevent the further increase in taxes and depletion of the Federal Treasury. Therefore, I urge higher tariff duties even to the extent of an embargo on all imported products which we are able to manufacture or produce in the United States until such time as those of our people who want work have found employment.

To me I can see no good reason why American farmers or workmen should be forced to compete with foreign workmen whose living conditions are far below that of ours, while millions of our countrymen are unemployed or are on Federal pay rolls.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 7513) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, I should like to ask the gentleman from New York whether or not we can reach an agreement in reference to the time of general debate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, for the time being it would seem to me that we would better run along on general debate and perhaps agree to a limited time tomorrow.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is satisfactory.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that no time for general debate be fixed, and that the time this afternoon be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 7513, with Mr. LOZIER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the House will probably remember that a week ago I made some remarks regarding the C.W.A., because of my position as ranking member on the minority side of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

From the answer made by the chairman of the committee to the leader of this side of the House, we understood that the committee would be called together. Upon examination of the RECORD, however, I find that this is not the case. I have, in consequence, again asked the chairman if the committee would be called together and was informed that it probably would not be. Hence, Mr. Chairman, this would seem to be the only forum which we of the minority party—with its positive duty to perform—are to have to express ourselves on the subject of these enormous expenditures and the methods used in disbursing them. The Committee on Expenditures should be in session continuously while there are being given away, in lavish fashion, billions of dollars regarding which the Committee on Appropriations has no opportunity to investigate. Certainly this, of all others, is the time when the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments should be in session.

I was told that the committee would not be summoned unless I was prepared to show that fraud and corruption in the expenditures mentioned did exist. That was a week ago. In the interim the newspapers from coast to coast and from nearly all cities of the country have carried articles and editorials on the corruption and political favoritism which has been brought to light—enough to satisfy any individual that it exists. It is not enough to say in answer that this is merely local to States and municipalities.

Now, while we are moving blindly, led by hope or faith in the President, at a time when many on the other side of the House are being told that they rode in here on the President's coat tails and had better be quiet if they wish to do so again, as a result of which their criticism is silenced, it is peculiarly the duty of the minority on this side to aid the Nation, and the President himself, by making vocal, constructive criticism.

Let no one attempt to put words in my mouth and say that in so doing we are antagonistic to the President's program or that we will refuse to vote for the funds he requests. My suggestions are made simply in the hope that hereafter a somewhat different method may be devised to spend these vast sums of money. Let us not allow ourselves to be deterred from this duty by the statement that "under the conditions we are not able to do anything, and that it is neither wise nor proper to speak, lest it embarrass the administration."

I once heard of a poor fellow who said that "he was drunk when he kissed the lady", and when the magistrate demanded that he prove that his mental condition was such as to furnish an excuse, he replied, "Judge, take a good look at the complainant yourself." [Laughter.]

So this afternoon let us take a good look at some of these huge expenditures which are being made all over the country, only, however, so that we may make helpful suggestions regarding them.

The mayor of the one city in my district telegraphed me urging a continuance of the C.W.A. work through new appropriations, and to make my own position clear I ask permission at this time to place in the RECORD a copy of his telegram and my reply thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

MAYOR ASHLEY'S TELEGRAM TO CONGRESSMAN GIFFORD

NEW BEDFORD, MASS., January 13, 1934.

CHARLES L. GIFFORD, Congressman:

Private industry has not yet improved sufficiently to take over C.W.A. employees. Abandonment of plan now will create conditions far worse than if C.W.A. had never been adopted. It will be impossible for city to assume responsibility of providing for workers at this time and continuance of plan through the winter is absolutely imperative.

CONGRESSMAN GIFFORD'S REPLY

MY DEAR MAYOR ASHLEY: The receipt of your telegram of even date is acknowledged.

As a stopgap the Civil Works Administration has unquestionably rendered a highly beneficial service in relieving unemployment, and I feel that Massachusetts, which has contributed so heavily to the Nation's revenues, should take the fullest possible advantage of this form of temporary relief. Any community actually in need thereof should receive this aid, but it is certainly my feeling that many of the methods which have been used in distributing it, such as the use of this money in grants to certain wealthy cities and towns which were fully capable of caring for their own unemployed, merits investigation and alteration.

Nor in my opinion can the Nation in its present financial condition stand the strain of any prolonged continuation of this form of emergency relief. An appalling debt, which must fall on the already overburdened shoulders of the country's taxpayers, is being piled up. Certainly, the whole situation demands thorough investigation and consideration from every angle, with serious thought being given to the financial future of the Nation as well as the present need. Please be assured that this whole most serious situation is having my most earnest consideration and that I appreciate your message dealing with the situation in New Bedford.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES L. GIFFORD.

Mr. GIFFORD. I want the Committee on Expenditures to be called together and to have a report made to it regarding the A.A.A. program as well. This is the only Federal administration authority that we can recall that had frankly and candidly admitted that it had made errors. But now Mr. Hopkins says that the C.W.A. program, too, has been a flop. Secretary Wallace says that the cotton-reduction program has been unavailing and that a normal crop is being produced in spite of the fact that 10,000,000 acres have been removed from production. If these great emergency measures have indeed failed, why not have a congressional committee investigate the situation and advise with the bureau heads as to future procedure? No; you do not want a meeting of the committee unless fraud and corruption can be definitely proved. These failures are not indictable offenses. It is not an indictable offense even when 2,000 workmen stand in line for 2 weeks, receiving 50 cents an hour for so doing, with not a tool to work with and therefore nothing accomplished except the payment of this dole.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. What has been the result of the birth-control program with respect to pigs?

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I should be pleased to yield to the gentleman for questions ordinarily, but this afternoon I do not wish to do so for this is a very serious matter, and I am trying to be serious about it.

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman will yield there, with respect to my own section I can answer the gentleman from Tennessee. It has reduced the price of hogs to 1 cent a pound, and out of that they have to pay a processing tax of over 2 cents. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the party in power does not now deny these things, but wishes to continue these experiments, in spite of the fact that the greatest Democrat of them all—so styled in 1928—now complains that we are all nothing but guinea pigs being experimented on. If one scheme fails they desire to try another, and while all these experimentations are being made the country is still stewing in fear for the future and gripped by banking and business paralysis. Fear is not being allayed, business is not improved by taking people off the welfare rolls, especially those of wealthy municipalities. The giving of money to them may be necessary under the conditions, but it does not appreciably help to prime the pump of industry or make the wheels turn faster.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question at that point?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman seems to be criticizing the present administration for what he calls a system of experimentation and of new policies. Does the gentleman imagine that this is what actuated the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, in his recent speech out West to abandon the principles of the protective tariff and advocate experimenting for a while with the old-fashioned Democratic doctrine of low tariff for the country?

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman wishes to get into a political discussion, well and good. I read that speech, and Mr. Mills did not abandon the old-fashioned Republican doctrine of protection for America. The gentleman cannot find a word of that sort in the speech, and the gentleman knows it. In view of the present system of giving money away, which for the time being induces some Republicans to be Democrats [laughter], the Republican Party must gradually draw those who have been thus deluded back to their old anchorage of constitutional government and rise and oppose any form of dictatorship. In peace times, at least, this must not be imposed upon our country.

But, Mr. Chairman, this political discussion is not in line with my remarks this afternoon. I merely wish to reason with you. Your A.A.A. is falling down. Secretary Wallace has acknowledged it. Why cannot he come before our legislative committee and let us hear the facts and take counsel with him? Do not let us go on without any explanation to Congress, which has to appropriate the money.

We have heard a lot of good things about the C.C.C. Well, I happen to be rather familiar with this program. The first 6 months passed and generally little could be done in the camps but build barracks, ball fields, tennis courts, and provide many other things for the morale of the outfits. Why not let this committee know what constructive work actually has been accomplished to date and what the expense involved has been? We hear little about it except what is obviously propaganda. Certainly the Committee on Expenditures could help the work if on investigation they found it worthwhile.

I listened with a great deal of interest last November to the report of one of our best Army engineers—and we have reason to believe that these officers are almost above criticism—when he stated that 900 men would be at work on a specific project by December. Two months after that date only 200 men were actually employed. This is mentioned to illustrate the great difficulty of extending speedy unemployment relief under the P.W.A. It is also true that the well-to-do States and municipalities are about the only ones which can obtain these P.W.A. funds, because they alone can produce the necessary guarantees for repayment to the Federal Government. Most governmental units have a limited credit and under State constitutions are not allowed to issue bonds, or are permitted to do so in very restricted amounts. The P.W.A., therefore, is not going to relieve all sections of the country, because many cannot get the credit to carry on operations of the type authorized.

It has, for instance, been suggested that Indiana will not be able to qualify for her share of the P.W.A. funds. But some of you gentlemen from Indiana are not allowed to criticize, since you, too, rode into office on the coat tails of the President, as your leaders have reminded you.

I have suggested that many wealthy municipalities have taken and will continue to take money supposed to have been used for the relief of the most needy sections of the country. My friend from Missouri says that they should take it, having contributed to it. The fact is that they take it because they can get it, and perhaps they would indeed be foolish not to, under the present system employed in the distribution of these Federal relief funds. But that does not affect the argument.

Mr. Chairman, we are all really very much disturbed over this tremendous indebtedness of $32,000,000,000 with which the country is to be faced. If you over there were free to speak what is in your minds, and discuss this matter, you could not but give expression to grave concern.

Now, for another phase of the relief situation: If the North Carolina Representatives could speak out they would tell us that farming is now beginning in their localities; that they have been accustomed to pay about $1 per day for some of the labor, but that now under the C.W.A. the former farm laborers are getting 45 cents an hour and in consequence there is much difficulty in securing labor. But they want to continue their loyalty to President and party, and hence do not openly complain. Possibly someone from that State will rise and declare that everything is all right, but my information as to these conditions there comes from people who actually own farms. Will this temporary aid to the State of North Carolina be to the best interests of the State in the looking forward?

If my chairman wants information, we have plenty to lay before the committee and it would take up many pages of the RECORD were I to attempt to insert but a portion of the complaints we have received. I am mentioning only a few items involving complaints of graft, corruption, and political favoritism. Would Los Angeles like to have recorded the complaint of its own Democratic State chairman and the facts carried in newspaper stories day after day? They are backed up by photographs which are undoubtedly authentic. They are not to be denied. The other morning I was called up by a newspaper reporter who asked me if I had seen the Baltimore Sun. He said, "Don't be afraid to suggest Mr. Hopkins, although he was not directly mentioned in the interview." Some of you have seen the article to which I refer, but I want to place a portion of it in the RECORD so that you will be sure to read it before the debate on this subject occurs in a day or two. Yesterday the chairman of our committee said to me "The Appropriations Committee is now in session; Mr. Hopkins is there and you should go in and hear him." I went immediately, but was informed that the committee was in executive session and visitors were not permitted, hence I do not know what Mr. Hopkins may have said then, and am not in a position to judge the merits of the statements presented by him in explanation of past disbursements. I do, however, now quote from the Baltimore Sun, and here is what Mr. Hopkins is reported to have said:

> We have got the bull by the tail and are afraid to hang on and afraid to let go.

You can bet that he is afraid to let go. The mayor in my city and in yours are afraid to let go.

> We are spending tens of thousands of dollars just to investigate cases of graft that fairly fill the air.

Mr. Chairman, my chairman says that unless we can show graft, there should be no investigation. Let him have Mr. Hopkins come in and tell us about those cases, in the investigation of which tens of thousands are being spent, and see if there are any Federal officials and investigators involved. We are not spending money like that without having Federal investigators on the job, are we?

I further quote:

> The lid is liable to blow off any minute. Some of our projects are lousy and we know it. The whole thing is a flop.

Read that and enjoy it, if you can.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Not now. I remember the many times the gentleman has refused to yield to me and others during his attacks on my party's policies. I am reminding you that money is being spent to pay musicians to entertain the public, to pay dancing masters to carry on dancing schools, and for countless other such things. I want to read from one newspaper published in Atlanta, Ga.—and the newspapers are our chief source of information—

> Under the direction of the Georgia C.W.A. all women confined in the State public and private charitable institutions will be beautified by 50 beauty operators and manicurists.

I do not care to comment on these things. I was, however, asked to put them in the RECORD. Each one must draw his own conclusions as to the wisdom of such expenditures. Would you Democrats tolerate such things of our party had it adopted any such method of spending the money borrowed at interest from the people of the country and which must eventually be repaid by the people?

Do you know of any municipalities which owe more than four times their yearly budget? There may be some, having municipal water or lighting plants which not only pay their own way but contribute to the general expenses, but I know of none in my section which would dare to owe that much, unless they owned some profitable municipal plant of that nature. Most States see to it that the municipalities are not permitted to go in debt for a sum greater than their annual budget, yet here the Federal Government is with a Budget of three and a half billion dollars and we are planning to owe thirty-two billion soon. It is almost impossible to believe that it can ever be paid off. In the recent debate in the Senate on the necessity of cutting the gold content of the dollar in half it was stated that, whereas we once had an annual income of $90,000,000,000, we now have one of less than fifty billion and that the entire indebtedness of the country was four times that. The Senator asked, "Is it conceivable that the people of the country can pay that four times as much?" It was, he said, absolutely necessary to have the dollar in order that the people could pay their debts.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. No. If it is inconceivable that we can pay 4 times as much, how can we pay 10 times as much? A tax bill is soon coming in here, but it will offer but little encouragement. The committee preparing it is afraid to add but little to rates and add but few new taxes to meet this great emergency. Shall we wait until the sales tax is usurped by all the States? This is above all the time—while we are giving money away to the States—to say to them that we must have the revenue applicable to the Federal Government, such as that from gasoline and the tax on manufacturers' sales. These and certain other good revenue-producing taxes should certainly come within the field of Federal taxation.

I want to call the attention of the House to an editorial about the "sugar bowl in Washington" appearing in the last Saturday Evening Post. I speak of it not because of the writer but because this sort of editorial should serve to awaken the conscience of our people and create a demand that this wild spending, without proper care or restraints, must cease. No matter what we may say here, it is the editorial thought expressed in our magazines and newspapers which these days interests the people, harassed and worried by the failure of business recovery, and the people will soon be awakened to the true conditions and demand retrenchments in wasteful spending, for the very safety of our national life.

Let us not have to go to the Nation this fall and say that we have moved blindly, without giving the President the benefit of constructive criticism, freeing ourselves of responsibility by placing it all on him. Blind loyalty is not the kind of loyalty which our Nation demands. The people want their Representatives to think as well as act. Certainly my people cannot ask me for that sort of loyalty, especially since I occupy the position to which I have been appointed. It is my duty, as a member of the House Committee on Expenditures, to the best of my ability to reason with the agencies which are charged with the spending of all this money to the end that means may be devised to have it expended according to the need and the resources of the people and municipalities receiving it. Can anyone possibly disagree with me on that point?

What shall we do about these complaints from farmers who want to get their work started; from those who have contracts to carry out? How can they proceed if the C.W.A. is paying so much higher wages than those paid for productive work in the same localities? Are you on the Democratic side to prevent us from offering worth-while amendments to the appropriating bill? Are you going to bring in a closed rule tomorrow under which we shall not be able to suggest such amendments? Why should we dole out money in sections of the country to a greater amount than is paid for worthwhile labor and thereby further upset conditions therein? Shall we listen to General Johnson when he says that "only those complain who are unwilling to pay a decent living wage"? What answer do the Carolina farmers make to that?

Before closing I want to say that I believe the minority party, to which I belong, must and will support you in this new appropriation, if it is the only plan for relief which you have to present. If you insist on continuing to spend or give away money in this manner we must perforce go along with you, but we do object to your bringing in another closed rule which would prevent us from offering proper suggestions and amendments.

Keep on giving away money to wealthy municipalities which do not actually need it at the expense of those poorer ones which do and thereby help them to escape additional taxes and you will still be open to the criticism that what you are trying to do is make Democratic voters out of Republicans. We hear this charge often and openly stated, but I am not interested in that. How easy it is to get into the political phase of any argument, but if President Hoover had adopted such measures for free spending and giving away of money, even when the Treasury was in comparatively good shape, imagine the criticism which would have been heaped upon him by the conservative men on the Democratic side, whose mouths are now closed, who dare not complain about the squandering of funds of the National Treasury during these days of what is akin to dictatorship.

I see Members on the other side who have proved themselves remarkable investigators. I wish that now you might be freed of your political chains and could get up on this floor and tear the hide off of such methods of spending as now prevail—most wasteful methods. I know that at heart some of you would like to do it. Why not come to the real help of our President? I am sure that he would be glad to have us take over some of the burdens of legislation. Why wait for him and his professors to assume the entire burden of planning for the country and the blame if the plans do not succeed? He has of late been trying to clean house of those who have come to Washington to make use of their political positions as go-between. You know it; and you know that he is anxious that all graft, corruption, and unwisdom in spending be shown up, so that it can be eliminated. Are we not to help him? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I regret the necessity of inflicting myself on the House again this morning, but I feel that I should rise in view of what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] has said.

I did tell the gentleman from Massachusetts there would be no meeting of the committee as far as I was concerned to take up an investigation of the P.W.A., C.W.A., and the rest of the alphabetical administrations of the Government, until we had something concrete to investigate. If the gentleman will read the rules of the House, he will find the jurisdiction of the committee is limited. Our committee has gone to the Rules Committee when it was controlled by members of the Republican Party and it has gone before the Rules Committee when it was controlled by the Democratic Party, and asked that we be given additional authority, such as authority to subpena witnesses, and so forth. We were refused that authority.

Now the gentleman says he is going to vote for all appropriations that are asked, despite the fact he says the money is being thrown in the gutter. If that is his attitude, then he should refrain from making such speeches as the one we have just listened to.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand the gentleman wants to leave the impression with this House that his committee has no authority to look into these expenditures?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I say the committee has no authority to go around the country. It has no money to spend.

Mr. SNELL. I agree with the gentleman on that, but the gentleman could call the officers of these independent commissions and other officials of the Government. A simple request from the gentleman would bring them up here, and that is one of the duties of the gentleman's committee, as I understand it, and I think the gentleman is shirking his duty when he refuses to do it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I admit that the committee has that power. However, as far as I am personally concerned, I am going to refuse to call these gentlemen. That is going to be left to the committee, and if the committee says to call them before the committee, they will be called. My argument is there is no necessity to call them.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I did not interrupt the gentleman. I made no statements that reflected on the gentleman, and therefore I wish the gentleman would let me proceed.

Mr. GIFFORD. Had we any meetings of the committee during the last 2 or 3 months of the Hoover administration?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. No; we did not.

Mr. GIFFORD. The committee did not hold meetings?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The committee has not met during this session of the Congress.

Mr. GIFFORD. During the last 3 or 4 months of Hoover's administration did not the gentleman's committee meet on consolidation matters and other things?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes; I misunderstood the gentleman. We did meet on consolidation matters and reported a resolution which was adopted by the House, which resolution set aside the recommendation of President Hoover because we felt reorganization should be left to the incoming President; and he has done a mighty good job of it so far. He has saved the people millions of dollars and is not as yet through. There is no need of my reminding the gentleman that when his party was in control of the executive branch of the Government I at no time embarrassed the President by conducting useless investigations. Why should I do it now?

I said the committee is going to meet, and it is going to meet; but the committee, and not the chairman, is going to decide what the committee is going to do.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has read newspaper reports in reference to how the C.W.A. money was handled, and he has complained about the rate of pay. He complains because municipalities in his own section of the country accept this money. No one went up there and threw a rope around their necks, brought them to Washington, and forced them to take the money; they applied for it of their own accord. The gentleman should find fault with the officials of those municipalities and not with the officials of the C.W.A. nor the P.W.A. nor with the Chairman of the Committee on Expenditures.

Now, I admit this money has not been handled in some localities as it should have been. Mr. Hopkins admits it and is striving every day to eliminate graft. He is discharging many officials.

Everybody admits that this was an emergency proposition. It was inaugurated for one purpose, for the purpose of giving men and women in this country an opportunity to feed their families. Naturally, mistakes were made when 4,000,000 men were put to work within a month's time. The program is working out fine in my community, and men are going home at night with money in their pay envelops, holding up their heads and saying, "I have something with which to buy food; and I have earned it, I did not beg it." At night they offer up their prayers for the man in the White House who made this possible. The gentleman cannot tell me he does not know that this was done to take our citizens out of the bread line.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentlemen who are registering complaints against the expenditure of funds by the C.W.A. and the P.W.A. should set out in connection with their protests the lists of the unemployed in their towns and what is being done to furnish employment to them under their direction.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I think that is only fair. The situation in Massachusetts is the same as elsewhere. The unemployed have been put to work; and if you did not put them to work, then you would have been required to appropriate money to feed them.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 additional minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I repeat that the committee is going to meet; and the gentleman from Massachusetts, being a member of the committee, will have a full opportunity to be heard in executive session. But the committee is going to work out its own program, and the chairman is not going to attempt to dictate. I do reserve the right, however, to have my say in opposition to the gentleman's investigation. I do not think he will object to that.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman be willing to have an inquiry as to these matters rather than an investigation?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. In what form?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, have Mr. Ickes, Mr. Hopkins, and others come before the committee.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That will be for the committee to determine. Personally I do not think that is necessary. Mr. Hopkins testified before the Appropriations Committee yesterday, and Mr. Ickes will testify when the President makes the request for more funds for the Public Works Administration. Read the Appropriations Committee hearing.

Mr. GIFFORD. How many of these organizations are there, from 16 to 21?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I do not know and do not care. As to the question of procedure, that will be for the committee to decide. Personally, I repeat, I see no reason for having them come down here. They are busy men. These gentlemen have told you what they are doing. They art not covering anything up. You can get any amount of literature from them. I can fill the RECORD with reports they have issued as to what they are doing in every locality, what they have done in reference to allocating money on Federal projects, and so forth. It is all published. I put part of it in the RECORD last week. Let the gentleman read it.

Mr. GIFFORD. Would the gentleman be willing to have Mr. Hopkins come down and explain how he is spending tens of thousands of dollars to investigate graft and corruption over the country?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I do not see any reason to have Mr. Hopkins come down when he is doing his duty. He admits there has been graft, and he is putting a stop to it. If he were not doing his duty, then it might be advisable to bring him down. But we all know Mr. Hopkins is just as much against fraud and corruption as is the gentleman from Massachusetts. He wants to stamp it out. Give him a fair chance. He will satisfy you.

Now, we are going to bring in a bill this week providing additional appropriations for this work, and it is going to pass; they are going to get the money. Governors and mayors all over the country are wiring in to all of us, saying, "Pass additional appropriations so they can carry on the C.W.A. work. Do not turn this army back to relief rolls."

If we were to take these men out of this work at this time and put them back in the bread lines, it would be the most dangerous thing for the country that could happen. There is no telling what would happen.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman from Massachusetts will be very much interested, no doubt, in reading a very informative statement made yesterday by Mr. Hopkins before the Appropriations Committee and which will be available to the House on tomorrow or next day. I think he will find that many of the questions he suggests have been answered very definitely by Mr. Hopkins.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I have been trying to tell the gentleman that. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that all of us in our school days were from time to time lectured by schoolmasters. We always profited by it. I am sure we have profited this morning by the 25-minute lecture from our colleague from Massachusetts, the former schoolmaster of Cotuit. Cotuit means, so he says, "Barnstable." He has been an honored Member of this House ever since Joe Walsh left us, the great Joe Walsh of Massachusetts, since August 1921. I am sure he must have learned his rights and prerogatives as a Member of the House of Representatives. If he has not learned them, I shall tell him now what a few of his rights are.

If there is a single bureau, commission, or department of this Government that is spending money wrongfully and unlawfully, he as a Member of the House of Representatives has the right to go down there himself and tell them to put their books on the table and show him where the money has been going. He has the right to check them up. He can see any record in their office.

If the committee headed by our friend the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], than whom there is no more lovable man in this Congress or one more anxious to do service to the people of the country, will not call the members of the Expenditure Committee together, then let the gentleman from Massachusetts go on an investigating tour of his own.

Why, I can remember not so many years back under Republican rule, if you please, when practically every member except the Chairman of the great Ways and Means Committee wanted that committee to meet on important business of the country and they could not get the chairman, Mr. Hawley, to call the committee together.

Committeeman after committeeman on this floor complained that they could not get the Ways and Means Committee to meet. Mr. Hawley had the effrontery to get on the floor and tell us that he would call the committee when he pleased and would not do so otherwise. Our great former Chairman of the Rules Committee [Mr. SNELL] will remember that Mr. Crisp came upon this floor and introduced a rule to make the committee meet, if the chairman refused to call a meeting, whenever a certain number of Members signed a request for the committee to meet.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question? You are getting into my territory now.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly I yield to the gentleman from New York. I am reminding the gentleman of some past history.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman name a single time during the 8 years I was Chairman of the Rules Committee when I refused to call it together?

Mr. BLANTON. I am not talking about the Rules Committee not meeting. I am talking about the great Ways and Means Committee under Mr. Hawley.

Mr. SNELL. I cannot answer for him. I thought the gentleman was getting into my territory.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no. I will say this for the minority leader, he was always very kind and considerate when he was chairman of that committee. He would call his committee together when it was proper and exigent to call it together and when it was expedient. And when it was expedient from his standpoint to report a rule, he reported it, but when it was not expedient the rule did not come.

I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] that there is a great responsibility resting upon his shoulders, because there was a record made here during the service of Joe Walsh, his predecessor, to match which he must work all the time. He must be ever vigilant, earnest, and full of endeavor to serve his country, because I considered it an honor to serve in this House with Joe Walsh, of Massachusetts. The gentleman speaks of the money being spent by the C.W.A., the A.A.A., and the P.W.A. and makes a lot of complaint about these three services.

Who is in charge of these three services? Are Democrats? Oh, no. The President in his wisdom has seen fit to put in charge of the A.A.A. a Republican who has filled every agricultural district in the United States with Republican appointees to office. I shall not criticize my President. I have never criticized a President of the United States, Republican or Democrat. If Mr. Secretary Henry Wallace has put any Democrats in any districts, I do not know of it.

Who is in charge of the C.W.A.? A Democrat? No. Is Harry Hopkins a Democrat? Oh, no. He has filled the United States with Republican appointees from one side of it to the other.

Who is in charge of the P.W.A.? A Democrat? Oh, no. Mr. Secretary Ickes has filled the country with his Republican appointees from one side of the United States to the other. Has he put any Democrats in any of our districts? [Cries of "No!" from the Democratic side.]

I want to remind my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts about some of my own investigation during some of his Republican administrations. I went down to Colonel Forbes' office and I said: "Put your books out on the table. I want you to show me, as a representative of the people, how you have been spending these millions of dollars." And I checked up their method of spending. I went down to the Department presided over by Mr. Secretary Fall and said: "Show me how you have spent the money Congress has given this Department." And I checked it up. And I carefully checked up various other offices in Washington on the same kind of service to the Government. I say to our friend that it is time, possibly, for the gentleman from Massachusetts to check up on some of these Republican officeholders who are now spending under the Democratic regime.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the schoolmaster from Cotuit.

Mr. GIFFORD. I should like to say to the gentleman that I sympathize with the administration because they could not find good Democrats and they had to go to the Republicans. But I rise to my feet to say that I am just as proud of the place I come from as the gentleman is of the place he comes from.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not making fun of that.

Mr. GIFFORD. Thank you. I want to say to the Members that the gentleman may know how to pronounce "Abilene", but I know how to pronounce "Cotuit", and the people who live there are just as fine as the people who live in Abilene. So if there is any sarcasm intended, let us forget it.

Mr. BLANTON. I endorse everything the gentleman says about the splendid people of Cotuit. Far be it from me to criticise anybody who lives in a small place. The present distinguished Speaker of this House comes from the little town of Carrollton. When you enter the town on the public highway, you will see a great sign: "The Speaker of the House of Representatives lives here in Carrollton." When you go into the little city of Potsdam, you will find that every man and woman there is proud of the fact that BERT SNELL, the great minority leader of the House, lives in Potsdam.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. And when you go down to the splendid little town of Uvalde, Tex., you will find the people of west Texas to a man are proud of the fact that the great Vice President of the United States lives in Uvalde. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman has referred to Potsdam as the home of the minority leader. I should like to suggest to the gentleman that we also have a very distinguished Member of Congress from Chambersburg. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. The great statesman from Illinois, who always smells so sweet with perfume and rouge, is an authority on such matters. [Laughter.]

Is is not peculiar, Mr. Chairman, that our friend from Massachusetts, the professor from Cotuit, has only complained about three Democratic departments and everyone of those is in charge of a Republican? He has not complained about the Treasury Department, the State Department, the Commerce Department, the Navy Department, the War Department, the Post Office Department, or the Department of Justice, all conducted by Democrats. He only complains about the three that his Republican brethren are in charge of and conduct the spending. We Democrats are going to try to keep our house clean and in order.

If you can show me where a single dollar of our money is being misspent, I will go right down the line with you to unearth the facts; and if anybody is taking money from the people of this country that they are not entitled to, I will help you put them in the Federal penitentiary, where they belong. [Applause.] But, for God's sake, in this time of crucial potentialities, it does not behoove any man from either side of the aisle or from any part of this country to get up here and offer criticism unless he has some basic foundation for it. It does not behoove him to cast a cloud upon the White House, where our great President right now is devoting his very life to the services of his country, who is sacrificing himself every day in the interests of humanity, whose every heart beat is a beat in sympathy with the suffering people of the United States.

I wonder if my friend from Massachusetts, during the last 2 or 3 days, when the thermometer has been below zero in many places, has thought of the suffering in the little hovels—not just the alleys of Washington but the hovels of America—where there is not enough heat to warm little children and women, where there is not enough food to give them the proper sustenance of life? Has the gentleman thought of that? Is he sympathetic toward that condition? If he is, let him not berate the Government.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama and Mr. GIFFORD rose.

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will take time to inquire, he will find that C.W.A. has thought of the little hovels referred to by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and that is what the President of the United States is doing—bringing them needed relief. The President says that in the great United States—a Government of plenty—no woman or child is going to freeze to death and no woman or child is going to go hungry if he can help it. [Applause.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Simply, Mr. Chairman, because the last few remarks were pointed at me, I should like to say that I have those people in mind and I probably am doing as much, according to my ability, to relieve them as the gentleman who just took his seat. I will match him on that at any time; and, as I have said—and I do not want these remarks misconstrued or twisted—that is why I am voting for this money, in spite of the way it has been or may be spent.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, whenever general debate is thrown wide open, as it is today, there always develops some peculiar quirks of political psychology which are interesting to the House and interesting to those in the galleries.

I was rather impressed with the attitude of my good friend [Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri] when he indicated to the House that during the past 12 months not one single meeting has been held by his Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments of the Government. I cannot help but recall that under the Hoover administration his committee was meeting all the time, and I think they should be meeting now. Something good usually comes when the searchlight is thrown on large governmental expenditures.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. DIES. Maybe it was needed during the Hoover administration.

Mr. BRITTEN. Maybe it is needed now.

As of yesterday, the distinguished Democratic leader on all matters affecting veterans' legislation, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] took the floor, and he was frightfully embarrassed and terribly distressed because a magazine called the National Tribune, which is printed for veterans, took occasion to criticize him as the leader of your party on that side of the aisle in all matters affecting veterans' legislation. The National Tribune and veterans throughout the United States are complaining to him and to the other Members of the House who voted for the gag rule when the independent offices appropriation bill was under consideration a week or 10 days ago.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] is very hurt—oh, his feelings are frightfully hurt—he is a very sensitive man under a Democratic administration [laughter], and he is humiliated that any veteran should dare write him and criticize his vote for that gag rule.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. May I ask the gentleman to state whether or not it is a fact that that gag rule in no way affected the veterans so far as remedial legislation is concerned?

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman's judgment is in error. It affected the veterans and wives of veterans of the Civil War and of the Indian wars.

Mr. MAY. But not the World War or Spanish-American War veterans?

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, they are all veterans. You cannot single them out. It affected war veterans. What is the use of you fellows on that side of the aisle trying to make people believe that the gag rule did not affect war veterans? It affected war veterans and it prevented you gentlemen, as well as Members on this side of the aisle, from offering amendments that would have straightened out many of the quirks and injustices that occurred after the enactment of the economy bill.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman answer directly the question of whether or not it affected at all World War veterans or Spanish War veterans?

Mr. BRITTEN. I do not know what sort of amendment might have been held in order that would have affected war veterans. That was a matter for the decision of the chairman of the committee acting when that invidious rule was put through.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KLEBERG. I should like to ask my friend a question. Of course, the gentleman knows that the bill under consideration under the supposed gag rule was an appropriation bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. KLEBERG. And on any such bill legislative matters affecting veterans could not well have been considered.

Mr. BRITTEN. That would altogether depend on the character of amendment offered.

Mr. KLEBERG. I just wanted to call that to the gentleman's attention.

Mr. BRITTEN. Now, I will tell the gentleman what that gag rule did. I did not blame the veterans and the Federal employees throughout the United States for criticizing you gentlemen on that side for voting for the gag rule. I would criticize you if I were one of them, and so would you if you were on the outside looking in.

What did the gag rule do? That gag rule provided that every appropriation bill to be passed by this session of Congress this year and every supply bill throughout the year could not be amended by attaching to it any increase of salary or compensation affected by the Economy Act. Any compensation taken from veterans or Federal employees could not be returned, once that gag rule was adopted. No portion of the 15-percent salary reduction could be replaced.

That was a frightfully drastic rule, the most drastic rule that has been presented to this House in the history of the American Government, and you gentlemen know it, because of its far-reaching effect. I hear the gentleman from Oklahoma breaking out with laughter and a groan. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I remember distinctly that we have passed a good many gag rules, and more on that side have been put into effect than on this—and for a good reason, too, because you have been in power longer.

Mr. BRITTEN. When this particular gag rule was put into effect, the veterans complained, and I do not blame them.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TRUAX. Is the gentleman aware that 84 Democrats voted against the gag rule?

Mr. BRITTEN. I am aware that a change of 3 votes on that side would have defeated the gag rule.

Mr. TRUAX. Does the gentleman still contend that the Democrats on this side have been following any self-appointed leader in veterans' legislation?

Mr. BRITTEN. All but 84.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. Why could not the gentleman from Illinois have secured the 3 votes on his side as well?

Mr. BRITTEN. Because on this side they all voted against it. There was not a Republican who voted for the rule. It was not possible to change 3 votes over here.

Mr. TRUAX. Is it not a fact that the Members on the gentleman's side of the aisle stood up en masse and voted for the economy bill that cut the veterans' throats from ear to ear?

Mr. BRITTEN. Well, that is getting me away from my subject, but I will say the vote was probably pretty equally divided on both sides of the aisle. At that time probably the Republican Members who voted for the economy bill did not expect the President of the United States to declare himself a magician and determine in advance the presumptive cases and literally destroy every vestige of the rights the veterans had—they did not expect that when the leader on your side took the floor and said that we should have confidence in our great President—that on account of his infirmities he would undoubtedly deal kindly with the veterans. We remember what you said, and we realized the force of it.

Mr. TRUAX. Did not the spokesman on the gentleman's side of the House say that the Economy Act would save $400,000,000.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is that the reason the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] on yesterday was so embarrassed and is endeavoring to apologize for his vote on the gag rule? His name does not appear on the petition for a soldiers' bonus now resting on the Speaker's desk. Nor do the names of other Democratic leaders who were so active for a bonus under the Hoover administration.

Mr. TRUAX. Is the gentleman's name on it?

Mr. BRITTEN. I have never paraded as a leader of a party talking for legislation of any special class. I do not suppose my dear friend knows, because he was not here at the time, but there was not a day during the past 5 years, hardly, when the distinguished leader on that side of the aisle on veterans' legislation, Mr. PATMAN, was not around here circulating petitions for bonuses. He was talking for the veterans, he was the patron saint of the veterans. They looked to him almost as they looked to God Almighty himself, because he stood for everything they wanted. He worked for them so constantly—morning, noon, and night. He took advantage of every opportunity that presented itself to embarrass Herbert Hoover and the Republican Party.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BRITTEN. But now the shoe is on the other foot, the embarrassment is on the other side. The administration does not want to pay any increased compensation nor to return any salary reductions. The administration does not want to pay a bonus. The gentleman himself [Mr. PATMAN] evidently does not want to pay a bonus. If he did, his name would be on that bonus petition that is on the Speaker's desk. His great energy and ambition in former years is quite in contrast with his timidity now. Naturally he is embarrassed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Oh, you cannot refuse an old friend.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes. I always yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The World War veterans in the State of Texas are behind our distinguished colleague, WRIGHT PATMAN, 100 percent.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; and the World War veterans in Illinois are against him 100 percent.

Mr. BLANTON. And that is a reflection upon the veterans of Illinois.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. For a question.

Mr. TRUAX. Does the gentleman defend the eviction of the soldiers' bonus army by Herbert Hoover from the Capital City of the United States?

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, the gentleman is going back into ancient history. Come down to date. Let us talk about the distinguished Democratic leader, Mr. PATMAN, who for the past 5 years has spoken for veterans. Let us talk about his embarrassment today; and it is not only the veterans, but it is every Federal employee of the Government, many thousands of them, hundreds of thousands of them, underfed, undershod, underclothed today, who cannot eke a living out of the salaries they are getting, and some of us would like to increase those salaries, and if not 15 percent, then 5 percent or 10 percent. For myself—and I am talking only for myself on this side of the aisle—I am for restoring the entire 15 percent that was taken away from them. The Government is doing them a great injustice at a time when vast sums of money are being spent in every other direction. A rank discrimination.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. Is the gentleman aware that the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation has not been called together in this session?

Mr. BRITTEN. That is another peculiar quirk in this political psychology. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] is the chairman of that committee. He was also a guardian saint for the veterans during the past 5 years. He never overlooked an opportunity to embarrass the Republican Party. Now, however, when he is so thoroughly embarrassed himself by the attitude of his own administration, he does not even call a meeting of his committee. Those veterans' leaders were politicians first and benefactors second. They could do much with the tremendous Democratic majority now in the House if they displayed but a fraction of the energy they had under a Republican administration.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield for another question.

Mr. TRUAX. Did the gentleman vote for the Hoover furlough plan for Federal employees?

Mr. BRITTEN. I probably did. Will the gentleman compliment me on that vote or not?

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman was referring to cutting the salaries of Federal employees.

Mr. BRITTEN. My memory has been refreshed by one of my able lieutenants here, Mr. MCGUGIN, of Kansas.

Mr. TRUAX. I am glad that the gentleman is a lieutenant of his.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am very proud to designate him as such, in fact I sometimes designate him as my chief. He reminded me that I voted for the furlough scheme and that I presented the amendment that was carried on the floor of the House that gave the Federal employees a $2,500 exemption. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TRUAX. Then the gentleman in a slight way atoned for his other mistake.

Mr. BRITTEN. What started all this conversation, my friends? It was this peculiar quirk I called attention to; the backwardness of important Democrats today under the present administration to do what they continually persisted in doing under a Republican administration, to the embarrassment of the administration. The situation now is completely turned around. The shoe is on the other foot. You Democrats do not dare come out in the open and allow the Members of the House even on your side of the aisle to vote for a 15-percent return of the Federal salaries. You do not dare bring it out on the floor; and if it is put in in the Senate, I challenge now—I shall not even challenge, but I make the prophecy that you will not dare allow your own Members to vote on it, because you know it will be carried and because you know it is just and it should be carried. You know these postal employees cannot live on the salaries they are getting with a 15-percent reduction and the loss of time that goes with it.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. BOLAND. Will the gentleman give us his reason for not signing the petition on the Speaker's desk?

Mr. BRITTEN. Ask Mr. PATMAN what he thinks about it and possibly I may agree with him.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Answering for myself and no other, I say to the gentleman from Illinois that if the Senate puts an amendment on the independent offices appropriation bill restoring the 15 percent, I will vote for it when it comes back to the House.

Mr. BRITTEN. And will the gentleman do this? In case the Senate votes only 5 percent, will the gentleman insist on his conferees bringing that bill back to the floor of the House so that we may vote on a 15-percent return, if possible?

Mr. MAY. I certainly will.

Mr. BLANTON. If the distinguished gentleman from Illinois will look on page 3624 of the daily RECORD for February 8, 1932, he will see that, excluding the President's salary of $75,000, the big salaries of the Supreme Court judges, Cabinet officers, ministers to foreign countries, and the $8,500 per year salaries now paid Senators and Congressmen, this Government then had 315,948 civil-service employees on its pay roll drawing basic salaries ranging from $2,100 to $16,000 per year.

Mr. BRITTEN. What do the rest of them get? $900, $1,100, $1,300, with 15 percent off, and they cannot live on it.

Mr. BLANTON. Some of the rural carriers get basic salaries of $2,100 a year for 3 or 4 hours' work a day, with allowances for expenses.

Mr. BRITTEN. We do not have any rural carriers in my Chicago district. [Laughter.]

Mr. STUDLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield.

Mr. STUDLEY. Does the gentleman know that in the city of New York some of the substitute carriers get as little as $5 a week?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes. In the city of Chicago and all the larger cities we have substitute carriers who do not get $10 a week, and they have families, and 15 percent of their wages is being taken off every week. I say it is not fair. At least, the House should be permitted to vote its judgment. That is what was prevented when the gag rule was put through. That is what is embarrassing my good friend Mr. PATMAN, the distinguished Democratic leader from Texas, and that is what is embarrassing other Members on the floor of this House, every one of those embarrassed, to a very large degree, coming from the Democratic side of the House.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. But not only the substitute carriers but the special-delivery carriers have to maintain automobiles, and they are getting $7, $8, and $10 a week, and they must maintain a car on it. I wonder if the gentleman from Texas realizes that in our country especially they have to keep up several teams of horses the year round to use when the roads are snowed under or muddy, and all that equipment has to be maintained, and it costs more than half their salaries?

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] knows more about that than the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER]. That is the reason they are embarrassed. That is the reason it hurts them. After talking for 5 or 6 years for the veterans and what they would like to do for the veterans, tickling the veterans under the chin all the time, it now appears that their first thought was not the veteran at all. It was politics they were playing. That is evident now, because if they were not playing politics, then they would be just as energetic, just as strenuous, just as forceful, and just as eager now to benefit the veterans as they were 2 or 3 or 4 years ago.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. Since the gentleman has been so frank in his answers, I want to say to the gentleman that I will be glad to join with him in the complete restoration of pay cuts for Federal employees, for service-connected and presumptive cases of World War veterans, for Spanish War veterans, and for the payment of the soldiers' bonus now.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that, and I hope he can induce the balance of his side to go along with me for complete restoration, and the gentleman will be doing a great job. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to yield 10 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from Arizona [Mrs. GREENWAY].

Mrs. GREENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I send the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD home, and my constituents have congratulated me on my silence [laughter], commenting that it was rare in woman. In order to be inconsistent, I begin to talk at once. I do not feel that I am wise enough, in my inexperience, to answer anybody here; but I feel, in coming from the State from which I come, I come with a peculiar knowledge, as if from a laboratory, about veterans, and I am happy to address my colleagues for the first time on what I feel are not party issues. I am asking sincere attention for the 10 minutes allowed me, to speak on what is very near to my heart, and may I preface my remarks by asking you to believe that they are not tinged with sentimentality, but they are genuinely accurate.

I do not suppose any novice ever suffered as I suffered over the gag rule. I had never heard of a gag rule until it was presented to me the other day in the guise that it was, of having to vote for it if I wished to indicate my party allegiance. Some of the people here had quite a little anguish with me in this corridor. About 2 hours did they struggle with me, and finally in writing it was established that to vote for that gag rule in no way precluded independent legislation in behalf of veterans' and Federal employees' pay cuts, and on those grounds, written, did I vote for the gag rule. My conscience is clear, and I think I knew what I was doing.

I once took a drive in a terrible storm with my mother. The storm grew worse and worse, and the lightning and thunder scared us terribly. I was driving the car and I could not see the road ahead of us for rain. My mother turned and said, "I am so glad I am with you, my child." I was amazed. I said, "Mummy, that was a very wonderful thing to say. Will you tell me why?" She said, "Because I have implicit faith in the Providence that looks out for fools." [Laughter.]

I feel as I stand here today I am being indiscreet to the limit. I feel I am the fool that dashes in where angels fear to tread, but I have come here to be useful, and to be useful I must be sincere.

There has become a fashion—I do not know whether to call it a street-corner fashion—certainly not a pool-hall fashion, because we do not hear it in the pool halls; possibly a ladies' tea habit, certainly a New York dinner habit, of discussing the problems of the veterans as you have heard the last man or woman discuss them, but not as you have found them statistically to be. If you ask 99 people out of 100 whom you hear discussing veterans' problems, you will find they have never taken the trouble to get a statistic, to study it, to learn it, or to cross the threshold of a hospital. I could, if I did not want to appear in a too light vein for my introduction, give you a monologue on the type of people I am talking about.

They say, "Do you believe that a man knocked down by a street car should receive so much a month from Uncle Sam because that man once served in a camp in this country and never went overseas?"

Who believes that man should? Nobody thinks of that type of jargon as anything but nonsense and wasting the time of intelligent people. We should have no more of such arguments.

Every one of us here knew that this country had to exercise major economies in relation to veterans; and the tragedy and the glory of last March was that the veterans were back of this administration on March 4. I know whereof I speak. Veterans receiving under $80 and under $70 a month on which to live squared their shoulders and said: "This country is facing ruin. If other people can take a 25-percent cut, we will. We will show our patriotism today with glory and support this administration", and they did. And they were right. But I get too excited about this. I have not yet learned to talk as you do, with real gesticulation, but I am practicing.

The answer to this is we made a mistake, not a major mistake, in that the policy of economy had to be; but we have not admitted that we made a mistake nor have we honestly and without party lines tried constructively to put to the administration the truth with the kind of unanimous backing and sober thoughtfulness that would get an attentive ear. We have practiced expediency, and political expediency, with veterans.

I want to give you in the minute or two left me a description of my home. We have two enormous hospitals. In these hospitals in 1924 were put to bed hundreds of ill men on the presumption that they might possibly have become ill through some service connection. Now, friends, think of this: Those men were not asked to prove service connection; those men possibly were not service connected if we are going to be honest with ourselves; and there is a very big school in this country that feels that those people never should have been put in those beds and cared for at the expense of Uncle Sam. But those people were put in those beds with advanced cases of tuberculosis, and some of them with insanity, and their families were given $60, $50, $40 a month to live on in 1924. Those people have lain in those beds, presumably put there by a group of Government officials, ourselves, put there and told that they would be cared for while their families paid $4, $5, and $10 a month on little shacks which they hoped ultimately to own and live in.

Today when you go through these hospitals in my State, hospitals built with Federal funds, magnificent, adequate hospitals, you will find that whole wings are empty and those men I saw there these years wasting away, who lost by the Economy Act that pittance upon which their families lived while they died, those men got up and asked for their clothes at a time when they had temperatures of 100, 101, or more or less, ill, cadaverous, with hectic spots in their cheeks; and those people today are walking the streets of my home State begging for work that they may support their wives and their children for whom we as a Government have been caring for for 8 years.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentlewoman from Arizona.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentlewoman from Arizona.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from Arizona is recognized for 15 additional minutes.

Mrs. GREENWAY. Thank you. I believe, however, I shall need only 2 minutes.

I did not mean to speak on veterans for a very long time. I hoped that I would prepare with great care an elaborate speech to present to you; but as I listened to the gentleman from Illinois I could not but ask for a chance. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a matter of party lines or party expediency. [Applause.]

We go into wars. This is not the occasion to discuss whether we should or whether we always will, but we have, and we may. A policy should be established by those of us who are here with high purpose by which our veterans can be lifted once and for all time out of politics and be cared for in the dignified way that I believe the citizens of the United States wish to have them cared for. [Applause.]

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. GREENWAY. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Right on that phase of the matter I have today introduced a bill which was framed after consultation with the various veteran organizations providing for the appointment of a commission to determine a permanent veterans' policy. I hope when it comes before the House we may have the gentlewoman's aid.

Mrs. GREENWAY. My ignorance is perfectly evident. I do not think I need explain it, and I am not going to apologize for it; but to those of us who sit out in that laboratory of Arizona watching all of you here, you in whom we have put our confidence, you people we have sent here to care for our national affairs, our reaction is a feeling that every one of you for a period had been exploited by the ex-service men.

But we feel that you in turn, for popularity, have exploited the ex-service men. It has been 50–50 right down the line; and now the issue in regard to the presumptive cases, which include the Spanish War veterans, is: Do you, as a body, mean to repudiate yourselves as of former years? Do you feel that you can take dying human beings—and when I say dying I pray that none of you may know what it is to die with tuberculosis; it is an hour-to-hour anguish that cannot be described—do you intend to practice economy on bed-ridden human beings this body of Congress put to bed in 1924 and told to build their lives accordingly?

Mr. Chairman, again let me say this is not sentiment; this is the human equation for which government was made. I beg of you on both sides of the House to lay down political lines and now or never do for these human beings whose lives you took what you said you would do for them in 1924.

I hope that by standing before you for the first time in a matter so vital to me, so vital to my State, that you will not misunderstand me. I am a Democrat anxious to make the Democratic administration successful. I know that in the sweeping efforts of last year some things had to be done ill-advisedly in part. I beg those of you who care for this administration and the responsibility that it has undertaken to square your shoulders along with your Republican colleagues who voted for the Economy Act—all of us—and say: "In major part our economies are right, but in some of their details they are wrong."

To undo in one sweeping act the results of 15 years of intricate and painstaking legislation is impracticable and unjust to the humans involved. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the law of evidence recognizes what is termed "the verbal-act doctrine", which permits a type of evidence to be offered not ordinarily admissible under the general rules of evidence. The verbal-act doctrine recognizes the force of human impulses spontaneously voiced, and such evidence is always convincing and effective. We have just listened to an impressive address by the gentle lady from Arizona which falls into that category.

When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] began his address, I know that the gentle lady from Arizona had not the remotest idea of speaking on any subject. She was so impressed, however, that veterans' legislation should not be referred to or discussed in a partisan way that she requested time immediately on the conclusion of the speech of the gentleman from Illinois.

Time was gladly yielded, and her spontaneous reply, I respectfully submit, made a most profound impression on the House and, I trust, in future may serve to remove from the field of partisan discussion all legislation relating to veterans, since this is a subject close and dear to the hearts of Members on both sides of the aisle and should always remain so.

Speeches that really carry weight and influence are not often prepared and studied efforts, but rather a spontaneous, sincere, and sympathetic heart utterance such as you have just listened to. [Applause.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN].

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, Mark Sullivan in a recent article on the consideration of the monetary bill in the House expressed the thought that the membership of the lower House was reelection-conscious. Speaking on the consideration of this bill, he said:

> Out of 289 Democrats voting, only 2 voted nay, and out of 128 Republicans, 38 voted nay and 68 voted aye. The meaning lies not merely in the completeness of the acceptance of the President's program, the greater significance lies in the spirit in which it was done. * * * A Democrat in the very highest rank of leadership, intelligent, well educated, and long experienced—and therefore able to understand the deeper meaning of what is taking place—said in private conversation: "I know well that the country is being carried toward fascism or communism—probably to, first, fascism and then communism, and I deplore it. It saddens me; but—" The shrug of shoulders which completed the sentence meant that politics was his career, and he does not choose to commit political suicide.

The Representatives are reelection-conscious.

This is a sad thought. I wish this were only a passing newspaper story; but it is the truth. The country knows it and we know it—that Congress is reelection-conscious.

I am not different from any other Member of this House. It is my ambition to be reelected; but I am firmly convinced that it would be much better for each one of us to be Constitution-conscious rather than reelection-conscious. For my part I lay no claim to being an astute politician of the first order. I do with modesty admit that I am not politically the dumbest politician who ever sought a seat in Congress. Of course, I have played some politics or I would not be here, the same as the rest of the gentlemen, but this is a world of compensation and we must pay for that which we do, and it is just a case of whether or not we are always willing to pay the price.

I am willing to play some politics, as every man in public life must. I am willing to pay a reasonable price, but I am not willing to pay the price of casting aside all that is time honored and time-tried in government.

Let us see what is taking place. I realize that when this administration came into power on the 4th of March last, the country was confronted with a great economic and social emergency. I realize that at such time a constitutional government may fail unless the constitution bends to the wind. I realize that it has been the genius of democracy with the Anglo-Saxon people that in emergencies they have been able to delegate momentarily extraordinary power to an executive. I was willing to go along in the special session and give to Mr. Roosevelt exceptional power to meet the responsibilities which were upon him as the leader of this country.

I realized the price this country had paid for 2 years by having a Congress of one political party and a President of another. I realized that in times of emergency there is nothing more costly than indecision.

While I was indeed sorry to see many of my good Republican colleagues and friends of the previous Congress fall by the wayside in the election of November, and I was sorry to see my party swept from power, still I was philosophical enough to reason that it was an ill wind that blows no good; that now we at least had a President and a Congress of the same party so that indecision would be at an end.

But here is the thing that hurts. In the guise of emergency powers we have seen constitutional government cast aside by this Congress since it convened in special session on March 4. Mark Sullivan is right. That has gone on and on until today Congress, the House of Representatives particularly, the great depository of the people's liberty, has become reelection conscious rather than constitutional conscious.

Let me say this: Every last one of us who took a seat in this House took our solemn oath before God and man that he would uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States. We can read this obligation over and over again and cannot find within its lines any mandate upon you or me to be reelected, but we can find the obligation upon us as Representatives in this Congress to preserve and guarantee the liberties of the people which were intrusted by the Constitution to this membership.

Here we are in this House with nearly three quarters of the membership of the Democratic Party, the President's own party. If there were ever a time when this House should be able to legislate in an orderly manner, it is now. It is utterly impossible for a small handful of Republicans, the minority, to throttle or embarrass the administration. If there were ever a time when there is no excuse for a gag rule in this House in order to carry through the administration's legislation, it is now. With the overwhelming membership of the President's own party, it is obvious that he will have no trouble in obtaining a successful vote upon legislation in this House, if indeed, his legislation comes within the Constitution and stands the test of reason and honest, critical debate. The truth about the matter is that every gag rule that has been passed during this last session of Congress has been passed for one reason, and one reason alone, and that is to see that the majority membership in this House does not function as it should function under the Constitution.

The Constitution has no comprehension or understanding of a gag rule. The very spirit and soul of the Constitution is that legislation will pass through this legislative body, based upon its merits, after free and open debate.

The gag rule denies this. There are occasions in legislation when I would say that a gag rule would be justified, and that is an occasion where the Constitution is bending to the wind. A tariff bill with two or three thousand items, which has been written after long deliberation by the Ways and Means Committee, is a piece of legislation which cannot be subjected to many amendments upon the floor by a body of this size. The same would be true of a revenue bill.

If there is an excuse for a gag rule ever to be enacted, that excuse can only be that it pertains to legislation which is so voluminous that it is not practicable or possible to deliberate upon it on the floor of the House. When the gag rule is carried beyond this point, then the gag rule is destructive of constitutional government and is only used to make it possible for legislators to dodge their responsibilities.

The gentlewoman from Arizona [Mrs. GREENWAY] delivered a most touching and a most truthful address, and when she spoke of the wrong which has been done to the presumptive cases and to the Spanish War veterans she spoke of a wrong which would not now exist except for a gag rule passed in this House during the consideration of the Connally amendment and the Cutting-Steiwer amendment. Either of these two amendments would have placed every presumptive case back on the rolls and every Spanish War case back on the rolls with a reduction not to exceed 25 percent.

This was very simple legislation. It was merely a yes-or-no vote in this House on whether or not the House would concur, first, in the Connally amendment and then in the Cutting-Steiwer amendment. There was nothing voluminous about this legislation, but there came the gag rule, which made it impossible to obtain a square-toed vote on that issue, and without this violation of fundamental constitutional government of enacting a gag rule to stifle honest open deliberation in this legislative body there would not today be a single man driven from the hospitals of Arizona, as was described a moment ago. This illustrates how far-reaching it is to deviate from true constitutional government.

Gag rule has been applied to the simplest of legislation. I remember one bill that came in here of a page and a half that had just one thing involved in it, and that was whether or not power would be given to the President to levy an embargo upon the exportation of munitions to any particular country which he might designate. It was a very simple question, but it was limited by a gag rule which prohibited amendments.

If this were only a partisan question, it would be a matter of small concern. If the overwhelming Democratic vote in this House today is unwilling to trust itself to deliberate fairly and openly upon legislation and it must have these gag rules, then well and good; but the point is that we have started the precedent now of using gag rule, not to make it possible to enact in an orderly way voluminous legislation but to make it possible for politicians, reelection conscious, to dodge their constitutional responsibility of sitting on this floor and honestly passing on legislation. [Applause.]

It was proper to extend to the President great powers to meet the emergency last spring in our banking situation, but that having been done, what do we find? We come back here at this session and the Congress was called upon to delegate its sacred constitutional authority over the value of money to the executive branch of this Government, and in doing so it shirked its constitutional duty.

This, again, would be a matter of small concern if it were only this Congress doing it, but the precedent is started, and no man knows where it will end. It is decay of the Republic under the Constitution.

We go a little further and yesterday, for the first time in the history of this country, a House of Representatives authorized a public expenditure by the Executive without limitation or restraint. Such was the statement of my distinguished friend from Oklahoma, Mr. HASTINGS, a man of long tenure of office in this body, a member of the Appropriations Committee, a Democrat, loyal and true to this administration, and one who, above all, is a Democrat loyal to his country and his party.

He stood upon this floor yesterday and appealed to the House not to make authorizations without limitation, because, in doing so, it was breaking a precedent that is time-honored in this body. Worse than breaking a precedent, it was violating the true principles of the Constitution itself; more than this, it was violating the true principles of parliamentary government from Magna Carta until now. The very heart, the very soul, the very genius of parliamentary government is that control over the expenditure of money shall rest in the hands of the representative body of government. Yesterday we cast it aside on the Navy bill, and when we did this it was not a case of taking power from you or me. Ah, we are but pawns in the game. Here is what we did. We took the power away from the people who sent us here to have some control over the money which is being spent and to have control over the amount of their money which is to be spent.

Yesterday, in one step, we repudiated constitutional government and turned back the pages of history to the days of Magna Carta when the people wrested from King John the right for them to say how much of their money the executive might spend, and not for him to say how much of their money he might spend.

From then to yesterday it was the genius of parliamentary government to keep always in the hands of the representatives elected by the people the power of control over the expenditure of the people's money.

We have started on the way and no man knows where the end will be in this program which leads away from the Constitution and the people's control of their money. Practically every appropriation bill which has come before us this session is indefinite as to what the money shall be expended for.

I want the administration to succeed, but I do not want it to junk the Constitution in all its parts. I realize that the Constitution was written over 150 years ago for an agricultural civilization and that the Constitution today may not be wholly applicable to a growing industrial civilization.

Our forefathers realized that they could not write a constitution to stand forever, so they made provision for it to be changed in an orderly manner by amendment. They never had in mind that the Congress would for any particular purpose delegate away the rights of the people, which had been won at the cost of blood and treasure.

The Fathers of this Republic never dreamed that Congress would do what it has done since March 4 in giving away the people's rights under the Constitution. They did believe that when the time came, if necessary, it would be changed in an orderly manner.

In conclusion let me say that, as for my part, I am ready to burn the bridges behind me. I am willing to support this administration when it has a program for emergency purposes for the human welfare of the country, but I am not willing to support the administration when it is carrying on a program contrary to constitutional government.

Washington was great, but not so great as the Constitution; Jefferson was great, but not so great as the Constitution; Jackson was great, but not so great as the Constitution; Lincoln was great, but not so great as the Constitution; Roosevelt, the first, was great, but not so great as the Constitution; Roosevelt, the second, may be great, but not so great as the Constitution.

If I must take my choice between blindly following the leadership made up of flesh and blood and the leadership of the Constitution of my country, I shall choose to follow the Constitution. Let the election of November be what it may, if I must go down, let me go down with the good ship Constitution, rather than to ride to a political haven on a ship of political expediency. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. HOOPER. While my opinion may be of no value, I agree absolutely and cordially with everything that the gentleman has said. If the gentleman had made this speech a year ago or 2 years ago, the gentleman would have had publicity throughout the United States upon it because his speech is a classic. How much publicity, I ask the gentleman, does he expect through the newspapers of this country now on the fundamental speech that he has made here today?

Mr. McGUGIN. I do not know that I have any great expectations on that subject. My answer is this, that the responsibility is upon the press to carry the truth to the people. That is its responsibility. The responsibility is on the people to accept it or reject it, and that is their responsibility. All the responsibility that is mine or that is that of any other Member of this House, is to have the courage to stand here and say that which we honestly believe, wholly unmindful of political expediency or effect.

Mr. HOOPER. I believe that, and I want to ask one other question, and I do so in justice to many of the splendid constitutional Democrats in the House. Is it not true that some of these men, when they discuss these matters away from the floor of the House, take exactly the same view that the gentleman has taken in his speech?

Mr. McGUGIN. I will say so, but there is nothing that would hurt me more today, there is nothing that would lead me more to believe that the remarks I have made are a failure than for any man in this House on either side to believe that I am now making them for the purpose of bringing political disadvantage to the Democratic Party or political advantage to my own. What I am asking is that Republicans and Democrats alike stand up and defend constitutional government and not barter it away for temporary expediency. [Applause.]

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. Since Mr. Roosevelt came into power a number of acts have been passed by the Congress and a number have been recommended by the President. In order that we may have a definite understanding as to just where we are going, will the gentlemen please point out the particular and individual acts of legislation that he disapproves, in which he thinks the President and the Congress have made mistakes, and do that by name, not dealing in generalities, starting with the bank moratorium and coming right on down the line?

Mr. McGUGIN. I thought I had made myself clear. I am not complaining so much about the merits or demerits of specific legislation as I am complaining about Congress in surrendering the constitutional responsibilities of Congress. The particular instances in which that has been done are the innumerable number of gag rules that have been passed during this Congress, the passage of the monetary bill, in which we passed over to the executive department control over money, which is fixed by the Constitution in the Congress, and in the bill which you passed yesterday providing unlimited authorization for the expenditure of public money.

Mr. ROMJUE. I want to be absolutely fair with the gentleman. Does he not honestly believe that the party in power sometimes has to employ the gag rule, and does he not honestly believe that it makes some difference whose ox is being gored? If the gentleman's party were in power, as they have been in the past, he would believe the gag rule to be fair and all right because his party was doing it.

Mr. McGUGIN. Oh, my friend, let me interrupt right there.

Mr. ROMJUE. Does it not make some difference whose party is in power as to whether the gag rule is a good rule or not?

Mr. McGUGIN. It should not.

Mr. ROMJUE. I am asking if it does not.

Mr. McGUGIN. My answer is this: I have never been a Member of this House when my party was in a majority; but if my party were in the majority and it would insist on passing gag rules for any legislation except such as tariff bills or revenue bills which have innumerable items in them, I would be much opposed to the gag rule; and I believe the RECORD will bear me out that this House has passed more gag rules since the 4th day of March than were passed by this House from the time the Republicans came into power in 1920 down to the 4th of March last.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. I have always admired the gentleman for the intelligent stand he has taken in the discussion of questions before the House, but the gentleman knows that when a member of a legislative body would criticize a program, in order to have weight and force to his criticism, he should be able to submit an alternative program. Has the gentleman submitted or attempted to submit an alternative program?

Mr. McGUGIN. I am very sorry that apparently I have been unable to make my views clear to the gentleman from New York. I am not so much opposed to the program as I am to the manner in which it is being carried out, in transferring constitutional powers vested in the Congress over to the Executive, when there is no need for it whatever at this time, because the Executive can always come to this House, overwhelmingly of his party, and obtain the legislation he wants in an orderly constitutional manner.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I understand it then, the gravamen of the gentleman's argument is that he does not maintain that Congress has done anything in direct violation of the terms of the Constitution.

Mr. McGUGIN. I claim this, that Congress by political expediency and legislative legerdemain has in a cowardly manner deserted its constitutional responsibilities and done that which never entered into the minds of the founders of this country or the writers of the Constitution. I do not believe that it ever entered the mind of George Washington, James Madison, or any of the other members of the Constitutional Convention that the time would ever be when the legislative body would by delegation pass over to the Executive the power which we passed over to the Executive in the monetary bill that we passed a few days ago, and the unlimited appropriation authorization of yesterday, as well as other far-reaching delegations of congressional responsibility to the Executive.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will pardon me, it seems that the gentleman's argument falls to the ground unless he can take the position that this delegation of power which the Congress has exercised is in itself a violation of constitutional limitation. What is the gentleman's reply to that?

Mr. McGUGIN. My reply is that if we carry on as we have been doing, then the Congress will abdicate step by step instead of at one fell swoop, as did the German Reichstag a few months ago to Hitler. Yes; the Congress is casting aside the Constitution step by step.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] has again expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands [Mr. OSIAS].

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman, I ask my colleagues to indulge me as I speak perhaps for the last time in the Congress of the United States, certainly for the last time this session of the Seventy-third Congress. Within a few days I expect to leave this august Hall and these familiar scenes and friendly faces to take my place in the ranks of my countrymen on the other side of the vast Pacific, because there duty calls.

History shows that the struggle for freedom from time immemorial has never been easy. It has always been arduous. It has been attended by difficulties without number. It has entailed sacrifices untold. Whether in war or in peace it has meant long hours of toil, no little anguish, much anxiety, and all borne in a spirit of sacrifice and martyrdom. The path of those who sincerely fought for liberty has ever been thorny. It has never been strewn with roses.

In the case of the struggle for Philippine freedom the situation has become such that the fight must be waged and the task must be undertaken and victory must be won in two sectors—the American sector and the Philippine sector.

It was my fond hope, with the action of the Seventy-second Congress approving the Philippine Independence Act, commonly known as the "Hare-Hawes-Cutting law", by which this Government sought to discharge its obligation and America made a proffer of freedom and independence to the Philippines, that the major victory may be said to have been won in this sector. But unfortunately the Philippine Legislature has seen fit, for reasons best known to Mr. Quezon and his followers in that body, to decline to accept the congressional enactment.

I waged a hard and honest fight for several months in my country. I carried the issue to the people. It was the wish of the people generally that they themselves might be given a fair opportunity in an honest plebiscite to act. It was right that the people should have been given the opportunity to vote on their independence and destiny. But, Mr. Chairman, when it was apparent that the tide was going in favor of those who were for acceptance of the independence law, the Philippine Legislature, dominated by Mr. Quezon, decided to decline to accept the act of Congress and appointed a committee or delegation to proceed to the United States. It should be said that the killing of the law in the Philippine Islands was done under the slogan of "immediate and absolute and complete independence", and on the promise that Mr. Quezon and those who were in favor of rejection could and would secure a better law from the Congress of the United States.

What was the purpose of the new committee or the new Quezon mission? According to the resolution creating it, it was to seek amendments of the law of Congress or to secure a new independence legislation.

Before the mission headed by Mr. Quezon left Philippine shores, Messrs. Sergio Osmeña, Manuel Roxas, and the members of the ninth mission who were here during the Seventy-second Congress and I informed the Filipino people of the temper of the American Congress and of the American people, and of the situation in which America in these times of depression finds herself. I told them something of my experience and observation with respect to major pieces of legislation in the Congress; I told them of the parliamentary difficulties, including the fact that in every Congress approximately 20,000 bills and resolutions are presented for the consideration of both Houses. The enemies of the law were stubborn. They preferred to gamble, and sacrificed the certain for the uncertain.

Time and again we asked the Quezon band: "How can you go to the United States and seek amendments to an act of Congress which you boast of having 'killed and buried'?" If they are right in their claim to have "killed and buried" the law, are they sincere in seeking amendments? The fact is that the Quezon mission have not submitted amendments up to now. Worse still, up to this hour the exact plan or concrete proposal of the new Quezon delegation is not known by the American people or the Filipino people.

I have been demanding that Quezon come forward with a "better bill." For several months others have been making that demand. That so-called "better bill" has not been forthcoming. I want to record as of this date—January 31, 1934—after consulting the leadership of the Congress of the United States and the authorized representatives of the executive department of the American Government, that neither the majority nor the minority of the new Quezon delegation has submitted a better bill. I want this fact to go on record for all time, and I want to state it here in these sacred precincts where freedom of speech is not only a privilege but a right.

You do not yet know, as Members of Congress, what the exact proposal of Mr. Quezon, who is the head of the delegation, is. What we do know is the dissenting opinion of a member of the delegation, because on yesterday, thanks to the courtesy of my colleague, Mr. GUEVARA, the communication of Mr. Isauro Gabaldon, as a member of that Philippine delegation, sent to the President of the United States, found its way into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 30, 1934. It may be rather strange that Mr. Gabaldon's dissenting communication should first be published before the communication of Mr. Quezon as chairman is officially released. But such is the fait accompli.

A study of the document in the RECORD, pages 1639–1640, is revealing. Mr. Gabaldon, a member of the Quezon mission, publicly announces his dissent. He revealed the existence of division within the delegation. He stated that he disagrees with the proposals of Mr. Quezon; and I am quoting:

> That the grant of Philippine independence be postponed to July 4, 1940; that a more autonomous government be established in the meantime; and that trade relations between the United States and the Philippines be continued as they are under certain limitations * * *.

Herein Mr. Gabaldon, as Americans say, has "let the cat out of the bag." He has revealed that Mr. Quezon has proposed not immediate independence but a 6-year period, contrary to the promise made in the islands, while he and his followers campaigned against the Hare-Hawes-Cutting Act. Because of this change of front, Mr. Gabaldon has registered his disagreement.

That means that Mr. Gabaldon is disagreeing with the specific proposals presented to the President of the United States, inferring from this document in the RECORD by the head of the delegation, Mr. Quezon.

So I repeat, there is division in the ranks of the Quezon delegation, and no other than a member of it gives us this intelligence. The Members of Congress have heard no attacks from me against the membership of this new delegation, in obedience to the policy adopted by Mr. GUEVARA and myself of no obstructionism. It is no fault of ours if the members of the delegation themselves obstruct one another. When I took the floor at this session of Congress on January 15, I plainly stated that I was ready to support any measure as good as or better than the independence law approved by Congress which can be converted into a law, regardless of its paternity or its authorship.

For the information of all interested, let me incorporate at this point the three formulas of Mr. Quezon defining his "stand on the Philippine problem" in an official report he submitted to the Philippine Legislature in 1931:

> In conferences with some Senators, among them Senators King and Hawes, some Representatives, and high officials of the administration I expressed my opinion that the Philippine problem could be solved satisfactorily through any one of these three procedures:
> First. Immediate establishment of an independent government, with free trade between America and the Philippines for a period of 10 years, limiting the amount of sugar entering the United States free of duty to 1,000,000 tons, and of oil to the amount that is exported at present, and restriction of labor immigration into the United States.
> Second. Immediate establishment of an autonomous government with all the consequent powers, including that of enacting measures considered necessary to meet the responsibilities of an independent government, when independence is granted with the restrictions necessary to safeguard the rights of sovereignty of the United States in the Philippines. For a period of 10 years the trade relations between the United States and the Philippines and the labor immigration into the United States would be governed as stated in the first plan. At the end of 10 years absolute independence of the Philippines will be granted, or the Filipino people will decide through a plebiscite whether they desire to continue with this kind of government to prefer to have one that is absolutely independent. In the latter event independence shall be granted forthwith.
> Third. If neither of these plans protecting Philippine economic interests shall be acceptable to Congress, I said that the Filipino people would, as a matter of course, accept any law granting independence, even under the most burdensome conditions.
> The first plan found no acceptance in any quarter.
> Even Senator KING (the American Senator who has been fighting for Philippine independence with the greatest zeal and disinterestedness) told me that the American people would never consent to the continuance of free trade between America and the Philippines in any form after independence has been granted us. This view is shared by all.

The full text of the Quezon report was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on December 22, 1931, by the Hon. Harry B. Hawes, then Senator from Missouri.

I repeat, for the sake of truth and for emphasis, that the Quezon mission have submitted no amendments to the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law. They have presented no concrete proposal to the Congress. They have not given any draft of a bill to the executive or the legislative branch of the Government. The chairman of the delegation has been gallivanting between New York and Washington. But, sir, I am no disciple of inaction. In the absence of a concrete proposal, in the absence of a definite plan, in the absence of an independence bill from the Quezon mission, and in the face now of the decision of the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs reached after meeting, deliberating, and discussing the matter on January 23, that there will be no new independence legislation at this session of Congress, and in the face of the statement of Chairman MCDUFFIE, published in the Washington Post for January 28, 1934, recognizing that it is "altogether fair to allow the Philippine people to have a referendum on this bill", there is but one path for me to follow, and that is to find the way out.

The feasible way out, reading the decision of the Senate committee, is to have the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law amended by extending the time to October 17, 1934. This will give the Filipino people themselves the sovereign right to decide their own fate and destiny in the exercise of their sacred right of suffrage.

I believe sincerely that if such a proposition could come to a vote, it would pass this body. Why? It is just; it is democratic; it is republican. It is just to both sides, to both camps of thought in my country. If the members of the legislature who voted declining to accept the law believe they have the people with them, then they ought not to be afraid of the outcome. On the other hand, we of the pro-independence party, who believe that the Filipino people would have gladly accepted this law, want this extension of time in order to have a show-down. In the ardor of that belief, I am risking my future and my fortune in order that I may meet the assassins of the independence law at home next June. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is one obstacle to every great ideal being translated into reality, and that is selfishness or greed. It has been the great consideration that has militated against the acceptance of this law. I want to be more specific. I think it is, essentially, sugar. I come from a sugar-producing country, and it is my duty to defend the economic interests of the land I represent. Prompted by the dictates of my conscience, I have fought against every attempt at discrimination against sugar, against oil, against cordage, and every important product of my country. I am on record on these things not only by my speeches on the floor of Congress but in statements at the different meetings of congressional committees.

To those people who favor scrapping the independence law because it does not seem to give them more sugar, I say here and now I am their relentless foe. Those who are more interested in sugar than in freedom, why do they ask for only 1,000,000 tons? You are pikers. Why not ask 2,000,000 while you are at it? To ask is easy. To get is not. The sugar barons and their allies should get together and shout: "Give us immediate, absolute independence, free trade forever, and protection for all time to come." That would be perfection itself.

But, in all seriousness, I do want to leave this thought with you. The Filipino people know freedom entails sacrifice. Those who do not want to shoulder the responsibilities that go with freedom ought not to be coming here asking for the independence of the Philippines.

Mr. Chairman, thank God I can come to you and look you in the face and say my people exalt freedom above sugar or every material consideration. [Applause.] I know whereof I speak because on this last trip of mine to the Philippine Islands, I went to Occidental Negros, the Province that produces the largest amount of sugar in the Philippine Islands; and I want you to believe me when I say that the people of that Province, depending upon the sugar industry more than any other, do not share the selfishness of the few vested interests. They told me, and I have it in the words of former Governor Jose Locsin speaking for the people of his Province. He said, "Sugar is sweet to us, but freedom is sweeter still."

Mr. Chairman, I am glad that Mr. Gabaldon has enabled you to see the stand he has taken. He disagrees with those who would place sugar as an obstacle to independence, because he says:

> I submit that the Philippine government does not have to depend on the income derived from the sugar industry to enable the government to perform its duties and responsibilities.

But I see from this same document that Mr. Gabaldon quotes the chairman of his delegation as having said:

> This industry is entirely dependent at present for its continued existence upon the tariff protection of the United States.

At this juncture Mr. Rafael Alunan, in his paper on the sugar industry in the Philippine Islands, which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 8, 1934, said:

> The foregoing facts and data demonstrate the absolute dependency of Philippine sugar upon its free entry into the United States. They also demonstrate the truth that the political, economic, and social life of the Filipino people mainly depend upon the status of the sugar industry, which supports the Philippine government to the extent of 60 percent of its revenue.

The logic of the statements of Mr. Quezon and Mr. Alunan is clear.

While I am on the subject of sugar, may I say here and now that the limitation of 850,000 long tons in section 6 of the law was arrived at as a matter of compromise. After all, every major legislation is a matter of compromise. No one here expects 100-percent success in any major piece of legislation he sponsors. I know that if we wanted a law that was perfect from every standpoint, it would be a long, long time, if ever, before we saw it enacted. I also know—and I am facing the inexorable reality of facts—that if the American people would enact an independence law that was 100-percent perfect from their standpoint, it would not be fair to us; and, vice versa, if we were to enact a law 100-percent satisfactory to the Filipinos, it would not be fair to you. But it is time that we descend from the clouds to the level of reality, and I invite the leaders of my country to realize frankly and fearlessly that the time for generalities is past. [Applause.]

At this juncture I wish to include self-explanatory cables exchanged between Mr. Quezon and myself while I was in the course of the process of helping push the Philippine bill to final passage:

FEBRUARY 14, 1932.

QUEZON, Manila:

Senate committee voting Saturday. Will work fixing early date independence. Need your views on date trade limitation or graduated tariff, plebiscite, immigration.

OSIAS.

The following categorical reply was received:

FEBRUARY 15, 1932.

OSIAS, Washington, D.C.:

I favor such date as would most likely become law. Am against graduated tariff and favor trade limitation and immigration as proposed by mission or suggested in my report. Refined sugar not very important. Prefer elimination plebiscite, but would accept it, if necessary, to insure passage bill.

QUEZON.

All comment is superfluous.

Mr. Chairman, I said in my country, and I want to say it here: "Viewed in the light of world economic conditions, considered in the light of the history of colonization, the law that was approved by the Congress of the United States by more than a two-thirds vote in each House was in the main fair, just, and reasonable." I predict, though I realize that the role of a prophet is precarious, that whatever independence legislation may be passed in the future, will follow substantially along the lines of the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law or the independence act approved by the Seventy-second Congress.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman, may I have the satisfaction of borrowing a little time from the other side just to have the honor of being indebted to both sides for their courtesy on the eve of leaving for the country of my birth?

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I gladly yield to the gentleman 5 minutes.

Mr. OSIAS. Coming from the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] I particularly appreciate it.

I shall proceed and prove my thesis, namely, that future legislation will follow substantially along the lines of the law we approved in the last Congress.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OSIAS. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman is making a scholarly and a courageous statement; but does he not believe that in the future if additional legislation is had upon the subject it will be guided more by the economic urge than by the spiritual urge?

Mr. OSIAS. I am afraid the gentleman is correct. I think it is the part of wisdom to accept the law we have now instead of continually chasing the rainbow and then perhaps end up losing the substance, being left with only the sentiment.

In fact, it would not surprise me in the least if the same sugar people who have been loudest in their condemnation of the present act are not even now regretting its nonacceptance, because they would have been sure of at least 850,000 long tons a year for some years, with the hope of more, whereas now they are not sure of anything, and the sword of Damocles hangs over them.

Mr. Chairman, there have been introduced in this Congress several bills dealing with the independence of the Philippines. One is Senate bill 2064, presented by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], a stanch friend of Philippine independence. This was presented on January 4, 1934. Mr. Quezon and the members of his delegation have been wonderfully silent on this law; they have not come out openly in its support. If they sincerely want immediate independence, why did they not get behind the King bill? They have been here over 2 months.

In 1930 there was a mission here, and in connection with the hearings held by the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs we submitted a statement, from which I quote the following:

> Different measures having been introduced for the purpose of solving permanently and definitely the Philippine problem, it would seem that it is our duty, for the information of this committee, that on behalf of our people we make our position clear in relation to said measure.
> We desire to reiterate our unqualified support of the bill presented by Senator KING, which provides for the withdrawal of American sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and the recognition of their independence without any delay, except for such time as is absolutely necessary for the organization and inauguration of the new government. This bill embodies fully and completely the aspirations of the Filipino people, and to our mind carries out logically and consistently to a happy culmination America's altruistic mission in the Philippines.
> MANUEL ROXAS.
> MANUEL C. BRIONES.
> PEDRO GUEVARA.
> PEDRO GIL.
> CAMILO OSIAS.

At the Seventy-second Congress, if I mistake not, the King bill received 2 votes in the committee.

On January 18, 1934, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] submitted a resolution for the immediate independence of the Philippines. If the Quezon mission really and sincerely desire to secure immediate and complete independence, they should have got behind this Rankin measure. They have done nothing of the kind.

I again say that we are face to face with a condition, not a theory. Almost anybody could write a bill that perhaps from his standpoint would be better than any other bill that has been presented, but the crucial question is, Can he get it approved? To convert a bill into law is the crucial test. It has to go through the hazards of parliamentary procedure in a body consisting of 435 Members in the House and 96 Senators, each one of whom is an institution by himself. The Senate by its committee says, referring to the Hare-Hawes-Cutting measure, that "no better bill can be written and passed." If that is so, I say the way out of the tangle, the way out of the present dilemma, is either to extend the time limit by 9 months, as I have pleaded, or the reenactment of the law, changing only the time, if there be constitutional scruples in the way or a revival of the substance of this law.

I take the King bill, S. 2064, on immediate independence and prove that future legislation must follow substantially the law that we have enacted. Section 1 provides the authorization of my people to convoke a constitutional assembly and to draft and formulate a constitution. This is one of the greatest rights that can be enjoyed by any people. This section of the King bill is patterned after section 1 of the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law.

Section 2, subsections (1), (2), and (3) of the King bill, which speak of specific points that must be a part of the Constitution, are now found in the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law, section 10, subsections (1), (2), and (3) of the law.

The King bill that has been presented provides in section 6 for a neutralization treaty to be concluded by the President of the United States with foreign powers. This treaty of neutralization is provided for in section 11 of the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law.

Section 7 of the King bill, which provides for the proclamation and recognition of independence and the notification of foreign governments with which the United States is in diplomatic correspondence, is section 12 of the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law.

Section 8 of the King bill speaks of a trade conference which ought to be held between representatives of the Philippine Government and the United States Government. This is similar to section 13 of the law that we have enacted.

Section 9 of the King bill dealing with immigration after independence is an exact copy of section 14 of the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law.

The very recommendations of Mr. Gabaldon in his communication to the President of the United States, with the exception of the time, are in reality in the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law.

I make bold to assert that the specific recommendations of the chairman of the delegation, judged from the context of the dissenting member's communication, will be found substantially covered by the provision of the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law. It is significant, that in the enumeration of proposals disagreed to by Mr. Gabaldon, nothing is said about military and other reservations or about immigration.

To me there is but one road to follow at this Congress, and that is to extend the time, accept the law, and later work for improvement. Let the time limit be extended and us, the Filipinos, fight it out. I believe if the people are given a chance, they will accept it. They will vote for it and overthrow those who have been the killers of this law and whom we have branded, much to their discomfiture and chagrin, as assassins of the Philippine Independence Act.

I do not speak with passion. I have been harassed and ridiculed, maligned and villified, but we have to be hardened to such things. These are the necessary concomitants of public life in a democracy. But I am glad to say that I have been able to keep my self-restraint. Even now I am being branded as a man who ought to be relegated to the limbo of forgotten things and, in addition, "forgiven, like the Roman soldiers who tortured Christ on the cross, for he knows not what he does."

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OSIAS. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Who said that about the gentleman?

Mr. OSIAS. This is an editorial from the Herald of Manila.

I have been represented as being "a liability" and an "enemy to the freedom of the Philippine Islands."

The legislature in my own country tried to oust me by presenting a nonconfidence resolution. I said, "Pass it. If you approve it, I will carry it personally to Congress and present it myself." This passed one house, but did not pass the other. I am sorry it did not pass, because I would have brought it here, and then invoked the personal privilege rule and I would have been entitled to one solid hour.

Mr. Chairman, I want to leave for the Philippines, as I want to inform the Filipino people of the temper of America, the friendly spirit of Congress and the spirit behind the announcement of the Senate committee when it announced its decision reached on January 23, 1934, and which I have embodied as part of my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD when I took the floor that same day. In the Philippine Islands there are some voices protesting against this "coercion", so they say, on the part of the members of the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs in their willingness to see the time extended.

This cry of coercion that is being aired in the Philippine Islands is being aided and abetted in the United States by some of the very same papers that for the last 5 years have been fighting me and have been fighting the Philippine independence bill and every Member of Congress who favored Philippine independence.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that I am the object of this spontaneous generosity, because it simply confirms what I was trying to say, and it is this spirit of friendliness that I want to carry to my people across the sea.

I want to go to my countrymen and explain to them that it was not coercion that prompted the Senate committee, consisting of some of the most distinguished Members of the Congress of the United States, in deciding the way they did on January 23. It is not coercion, certainly, for them to decide to give us one more chance to vote on our liberty. It is not coercion, certainly, when they leave to us the determination of our future; and it is not coercion when they say, in plain language, that Congress retains an open mind about modification of the Hare-Hawes-Cutting bill at some future period, or if, after acceptance, the Philippines show they want independence, Congress would have no objection to considering the objections, with the possibility of modifying the measure if it is deemed advisable.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OSIAS. I yield to my friend from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from the Philippines will recall that when the bill was before the House I expressed doubt as to the wisdom of having a provision in the bill providing for a plebiscite; and if the gentleman will recall, I prophesied at that time that, through some hook or crook, the plebiscite provision would be used to defeat the very thing that Congress sought to accomplish, namely, to give the Filipino people their independence. The gentleman will recall that.

Mr. OSIAS. I recall that and, may I add that I appreciate the contribution of the gentleman, because he has always been interested in the granting of Philippine independence at the earliest practicable date. But the law was rejected, not because it had a plebiscite provision, but because the legislature by and of itself decided to act without endorsing it to the people of the Philippine Islands or having a convention called for the purpose of acting on the law.

But I was starting to say, Mr. Chairman, and I want to continue, that it is not with any desire of coercion, but in a spirit of fair play and friendliness that members of the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, and men like Mr. McDUFFIE, and those distinguished men who serve with him on the Committee on Insular Affairs—it is not self-interest, it is not coercion or intimidation that prompt these men, and it is my purpose to explain to my people the true intent and purpose of the Congress of the United States in the enactment of this law.

I think it can be said in all sincerity that there must be few Members who have received the courtesy and the kindly consideration that I have received during my service in the Congress of the United States.

Whatever may be the vicissitudes of the future, I shall always cherish, as one of my priceless treasures in life, the friendship, the esteem of the Members of the Congress of the United States, and their sympathetic attitude toward the freedom of the people of the Philippines.

Mr. Chairman, I have faith in my people; I have faith in America, and this faith has been strengthened, not weakened, by the passage of the Independence Act by the Seventy-second Congress. I hope that this faith will be further strengthened by doing that which I am for the last time pleading for; namely, to extend the time within which the Filipino people may act on their own destiny. Do this and you will be practicing true democracy. You will enable the Filipinos to go through the same processes which every nation, aspiring to occupy a place in the family of free nations of the world, must go through.

I am leaving, in the confidence that Congress will do right by us. I shall interpret the spirit of America as best I can to the Filipino people, and in the light of my understanding of and with the leaders and Members of Congress.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OSIAS. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The Filipino people will elect a new legislature in June, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. OSIAS. Yes; our next election will be on June 5.

Mr. KNUTSON. Then if the Hare-Hawes-Cutting bill were extended 9 months, this would automatically give the Filipino people an opportunity to vote upon independence?

Mr. OSIAS. Exactly; and that, Mr. Chairman, is the reason I am making this plea. Besides, the new legislature will convene on July 16. May I state ere closing that I am going home to run for a seat in the senate, abandoning a $10,000 job for a $3,000 job, because I believe that great ideals beckon, and ideals are beckoning me to my country. [Applause.]

I entertain the fond hope, sir, that when the last chapter of the American-Filipino relations will at last be written, and I trust it may soon be written, it will be one that will do credit and honor both to the United States and the Philippine Islands, and one which will be pronounced by the impartial verdict of history as being righteous altogether. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a draft of the platform and seven-point program for my colleagues and myself and upon which we stand in the titanic struggle which we expect to wage in the Philippines.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from the Philippines asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter above referred to follows:

OUR PLATFORM AND SEVEN-POINT PROGRAM

The people to whom we owe first loyalty are entitled to know our main ideas, principles, and plans as we appear before the electorate of our district to appeal for their vote and support in the present titanic struggle for a cause which involves the life, the liberty, and the happiness not only of the present generation but of generations yet unborn. We hereby present our platform and seven-point program seeking popular indorsement at the polls in the next general elections.

I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

We share the firm conviction of the Filipino people that the grant of independence at the earliest practicable date is the proper solution of the Philippine question. We believe in an independence law as good as or better than the Independence Act (Hare-Hawes-Cutting law) sanctioned in consultation not with the leaders alone but with the masses themselves.

As in the past, we believe that the four main pillars upon which Philippine democracy must rest are education, agriculture, commerce, and industry.

We believe in honesty, merit, and economy in our government.

We believe in the administration of justice to rich and poor alike without fear or favor.

Faithful to the cardinal principles of democracy and devoted to the sound nationalism of patriotic Filipinos, we shall cooperate in full measure toward achieving those ends for which good governments exist.

II. HEALTH, SANITATION, EDUCATION

Our human resources are the country's greatest asset. Health, personal and public, is basic.

The government and the people in partnership must cooperate in the furtherance of a national program of health, sanitation, and education.

We support movements calculated to reduce mortality, prevent disease, lessen its ravages, and develop hospitals and clinics.

Our love of education is excelled only by our passion for freedom. Education is the bulwark of democracy. The government owes it to itself and the people to establish and maintain an adequate school system and enlighten the masses.

An elementary education is the birthright of every child. There should be ample opportunity for secondary education both cultural and vocational. A state university should be properly supported as the capstone of the system of tax-supported institutions of learning. Our country needs normal schools, colleges, and universities for the training of leaders.

We favor the establishment of part-time schools for the common people to wipe out illiteracy and for the education of the poor who cannot attend schools on a full-time basis.

We recognize the sacrificial patriotism of teachers. They are entitled to a living and a saving wage.

We advocate the establishment of a university branch of Pangasinan.

III. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

A country like the Philippines, blessed with rich resources and unlimited potentialities, should be assured in its progressive economic development.

With unexcelled fertility of the soil, the future should witness an agricultural reawakening. The government should lend support to the rice and tobacco industries just as it has aided and is aiding the sugar industry.

We favor cooperative organizations for rice and tobacco growers. We must have cooperative marketing laws. For the stability of Philippine society, the relationship between employers and employees, landowners and tenants, capitalists and laborers must be placed on a just and equitable basis.

We believe in the principle and practice of sane protectionism. We must patronize Philippine industries.

Products not immediately used should be conserved. Finding new uses of Philippine products now largely wasted is a national concern.

The largest single industry of one of our neighboring countries is fishing. The Philippines, with her streams, ponds, lakes, and seas, is a fertile country for the development of the fishing industry in its different branches.

Too much of the trade and commerce of the Philippines is in the hands of foreigners. The nationals must have a greater share of Philippine business.

Increased credit facilities ought to be extended to small farmers and Filipino business men.

We must inculcate greater economic-mindedness among the young men and young women of today, the citizens and leaders of tomorrow.

IV. CONSERVATION, FORESTATION, FLOOD CONTROL

As the author of a law on conservation, forestation, and reforestation when the undersigned was a senator of the Second District, we shall continue our interest in this very important problem. The forestal wealth of the country is our greatest single wealth.

A systematic program of forestation and reforestation must be adopted to keep and increase the country's wealth and as a measure of flood control.

The control and husbanding of streams, the construction of dikes and revetments, and the like, must be attended to in order to lessen the annual destruction of floods to property and life.

V. CURRENCY, CREDIT, AND FINANCE

Our revenue system must be restudied and reformed.

Taxation on the basis of the citizen's ability to pay should be implanted.

Filipinos need increased credit facilities if they are to have a greater part in the commercial and industrial development of the country that gave them birth.

Our mining laws should be modernized. Careful consideration should be given to the severance tax and tax on luxuries.

The government budget must be balanced. The stability of the peso must be secured. Greater attention should be given toward a reform or stabilization of our banking system and currency.

VI. POLITICS AND GOVERNMENT

A government exists for the people. We are for a government of laws, not of men. We favor the merit system, not the spoils system, in the public service.

Democracy, not autocracy or dictatorship, is what we desire. Terrorism should be replaced by the spirit of patriotic service in the government.

Political parties are essential in the life of the nation. Let us uphold the principle of democracy and republicanism in our country to insure the greatest measure of prosperity, progress, happiness, and independence.

VII. SELF-RELIANCE AND INDEPENDENT CITIZENRY

While government is important, it is not everything in a democracy. A government is only as good and as strong as the citizens make it. We believe in wresting the government from a selfish leadership and vesting it in the sovereign people.

An alert public must assist in extending education, improving health and sanitation, bettering our system of transportation and communication, and effecting needed public improvements. There must be concerted action to effect recovery and insure progress.

We must foster a spirit of freedom, self-help, and self-reliance in thought and action on the part of the citizenry of this nation in order to deserve a rightful place in the concert of free nations of the world.

APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE

Loyal to the welfare of the people and the principles of the partido nacionalista proindependencia, I appeal to the patriotism of all proindependence men and women regardless of previous political affiliations. I invite the cooperation of our fellow citizens and fellow electors of the Second Senatorial District to make the ideas set forth in our platform and seven-point program triumph.

People of La Union, Pangasinan, and Zambales, we earnestly solicit your vote and support.

Yours for a free and independent Philippines.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this session of Congress has been in being less than 30 days, a very short time, and yet long enough to make painfully clear that Congress has ceased to exist as the legislative branch of the Government.

Free speech has been suppressed in this House by gag rules, the taskmaster's whip has been cracked over our backs by limitation of debate, we have been threatened with the displeasure and discipline of the Executive if we do not spend in 4 weeks more money than this Government can collect by legitimate taxation in 4 years.

We are told by leaders that the President demands these things and that the country stands back of the President unanimously. Not yet in words, but in inference, we are threatened with lynching at the hands of an outraged public if we so much as stop to ask where we are going.

There are two things which a man must have if he is to be called a leader. He must be going some place and somebody must be following him. The gentlemen who appear as leaders on this floor are not leaders in any sense of the word. They do not lead. They follow. They do not hold the status of generals or colonels or majors or captains or even second lieutenants. They are corporals and file closers, whose only permitted function is to shout "Hep! Hep!" and pass the orders to this awkward squad which is not yet trained to the technique of the goose step.

I am not making a partisan Republican speech. I was thrown out of the Republican Party by the alleged leadership of that organization 2 years ago. I have had my own experiences with leadership. When I was cast into the outer darkness by the leaders of the party of which I have been a member all my life, the Republican voters of my district went out into the shadows with me. After looking over their surroundings, the Democratic voters of my district followed their Republican neighbors and joined us in the wilderness of Presidential disapproval. I was reelected on both Democratic and Republican tickets, and I hold my warrant as a Member of this House from the people and not from the parties of my district.

If I am partisan—and I may as well admit that I am—that partisanship is for the people whom I represent. I received their orders in November 1932. Those orders have never been countermanded, and I will follow them until they are countermanded by the people from whom I accepted them. I will take orders from no one else.

Franklin Delano Roosevelt received his orders on the same day that I received mine. The orders he is following today are not the orders he accepted then—and the orders he accepted then were drafted by himself in his campaign pledges and sealed with his inaugural oath. I do not know the source of the orders he is following today. I do not know that he is following either order or orders. He admits himself that he is trying first one course of procedure and then another in the hope of finding a good one. He has not presented to this body, to the Senate, or to the public any plan nor any program of what he proposes to do with us.

He has shown but one of the qualifications of leadership. People are following him, but he does not know where he is going. I cannot follow him until I know his destination—not and keep my self-respect as a man and an American. Neither can the people of the United States. Neither will the people of the United States.

His friends will say, "But he should be given his chance." Right. But so should the rest of the country. I do not question the sincerity or the courage of Mr. Roosevelt. I question his ability and his judgment, and shall continue to question them until I have seen more proof of his infallibility than I have seen to date.

Any man who asks for such unprecedented power as he seeks should be willing to show that he has the capacity to use that power properly, effectively, and without danger to the country. No such proof has been forthcoming. All that we have had is a hallelujah chorus of adulation delivered through a controlled radio and such part of the press as could be bullied or frightened into complaisance. This Roosevelt opera is all overture so far. It is time for the curtain to go up.

What we may wish to say upon this floor as Representatives of the people of the United States may be wrong, but it is our inalienable duty and our inalienable right to say it. What truth we may wish to disclose in the public interest must not be suppressed for any reason—least of all to delude the people or to establish or maintain in this country any form of government other than that provided in our Constitution.

Partisanship! Gentlemen of the majority, you are creating partisanship. There is no longer a Republican Party. It choked itself to death trying to swallow the candidacy of Herbert Hoover for reelection to the Presidency. There is no longer a Democratic Party. There is only Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

The partisanship that you are creating is a partisanship that will aline two opposing forces in this country—the people versus the Government. The American people are thoughtful and deliberate, but they always achieve decision in the end. When this extravaganza of experiment and expenditure, this blind stumbling in the face of disaster, shall have reached its inevitable climax, when all our alphabetical overlords shall have unified themselves into one mighty final set of initials and those initials the fateful I O U, then, gentlemen of the majority, you will have partisanship. It will be partisanship based on bitterness and disillusionment.

Why is it that you fear debate? Why is it that your leader answers no questions, gives no information, offers no chart or road map, but demands only unthinking obedience to orders which he himself cannot put into words? Gentlemen of the majority, why do you sit silent and refuse to defend your course? Is it because that course has no defense—or is because you do not know what the course is nor whether there is any defense for it?

This is a two-party system of government. Today there is only one party. That party seeks to rule with an absolute hand. It seeks to suppress opposition. So far as the Republican opposition is concerned, you have succeeded, but not through your own efforts. The Republican Party destroyed itself by the course which you yourselves condemned before election and embraced after inauguration.

This is still a two-party system of government. There will be another party forced into existence by your attempt to establish a dictatorship. Every man and woman within sound of my voice knows that such a party is being born in the womb of the public mind. Most of you are thinking very seriously about the effect upon your own political futures of that foreshadowed event.

In these remarks I am defending the people and institutions of the United States. In saying that there will inevitably be born a new political party to oppose the present control of our national affairs I am not speaking alone. Many competent and reputable agencies of public opinion have already reflected popular opposition to the present attempt to strangle free speech and a free press in the United States.

Only a few weeks ago the Saturday Evening Post, our most outstanding weekly publication, editorially expressed the rising demand for a new political party that should be free of the unfortunate alliances and obligations of the present organizations. Mr. William Randolph Hearst has used the columns of his newspapers to protest against improper alien influence in our National Government and against any limitation in the traditional freedom of the press. Col. Robert R. McCormick, publisher of the Chicago Tribune, has made many eloquent pleas against any infringement upon the constitutional right of free expression in public matters.

Gentlemen of the majority, these and many other moving fingers have penned the handwriting on this wall you have tried to build around the rights and privileges which you ask that we surrender to your leader.

For many years the affairs of this country were mishandled by self-styled financial experts who seized upon political power in the name of business. Their dishonesty of thought and method were the fabric of our disaster. The land rose and cried out against these men. You seized the public resentment as your opportunity and by promising to it satisfaction for its wrongs, you won your way into power. You had a great opportunity. What did you do with it?

You turned over the processes of government to the very same individuals who had wrecked us as financial experts, giving them barely time to change their clothes and rechristen themselves economic experts. You asked and secured unlimited executive power in the name of emergency and then turned that power over to the men you had denounced as criminals, giving them legal protection and unlimited use of the public funds to bring their personal ambitions to a profitable conclusion.

No single evil of the Hoover administration has been corrected. Many of them have been perpetuated. Men who acquired fortune and dishonor by swindling the public as individuals are now placed in official positions where they can swindle us collectively through control of our Federal Treasury.

We are asked to believe that virtue and wisdom are conferred upon men by appointment to Federal office. The great effort to make all men virtuous by legislation having failed, it is now sought to do the same thing by proclamation.

The Civil Works Administration is an example of the unholy result. Petty extortions from hungry men, graft squeezed from their few weekly dollars, became so uncontrollable a scandal that the C.W.A. had to put itself under martial law by calling upon the Army to direct its activities. Is this a foretaste of military dictatorship, to be made necessary by the failure of civil government?

Free government can rest upon no foundation but that of truth. Censorship, propaganda, suppression—all these are the enemies of truth. All three are practiced by this administration in the name of emergency.

Particularly is this true of the newest avenue to public attention—radio. Some time ago the Columbia Broadcasting Co. announced its intention to furnish to its listeners a daily news service. The company employed several Washington newspapermen and established a news bureau which has paid particular attention to proceedings in both Houses of Congress. It has been their custom to broadcast this news at a certain hour each evening. Last Saturday evening, January 27, Mr. Farley, who in his one person combines the functions of the Warwick and the Sancho Panza of this administration, appeared at a political rally in Boston, Mass. He desired that his remarks on that occasion be put upon the air. The Columbia Broadcasting Co. canceled its news service for the evening, gave its local news-gathering employees a holiday, and gave the news period to Mr. Farley for his remarks. Either they valued their news service too little or the words of Mr. Farley too much. A news service that has to make way for propaganda is not an independent news service, nor can its professed news be given any serious consideration.

Let me offer two quotations. The first is from the Washington Post of November 5, 1933. It reads:

> Herbert L. Pettey, Secretary of the Radio Commission, has been directed to coordinate radio speeches of officials, obtain free time on the air for them from the radio stations licensed by his agency, and with the aid of R. Fred Roper, executive secretary of the Democratic National Committee, revise or censor such speeches with the view of making every word count for the administration.

Pettey was assigned to the job by Postmaster General Farley.

The next quotation is from the New York Herald Tribune of November 2, 1933. It reads:

> ROCHESTER, November 1.—Assemblyman Richard L. Saunders today charged in a statement that he had been given a "raw deal" and had been ruled off the air by the management of station WHAM because of criticism of Postmaster General Farley in a speech prepared for delivery last night in answer to an address Monday night by the Democratic leader.
> Assemblyman Saunders said he had presented his speech for approval, and had been asked if it could not be toned down. On his reply that it could not, said Saunders, he was told that he could not make the speech.

Newspapers justify their existence by their willingness to print the news, whether or not that news agrees with the political opinions of their publishers. Radio must learn the same lesson before it presumes to put itself forward as a medium for the dissemination of news. News is a record of events. It is not a medium for propaganda. The newspaper which prints a statement puts itself upon record; forever afterwards the printed words themselves commit such newspapers to full legal responsibility for what they have said. Copies of their own pages are evidence of what they have said and in the event that charges of libel are made, those same pages may be introduced in court as competent evidence.

The newspaper is bound by what it says and makes no effort to avoid that responsibility.

Radio, on the other hand, is limited to the spoken word, heard but once and nowhere upon record. Many times I have sought to obtain from radio stations transcripts of statements that have been made to their listeners through their facilities. Sometimes I have been successful in securing such transcripts. More often I have not been so successful—and the latter instances often occurred in cases where the reported accounts of what had been said implied a legal responsibility on the part of the radio station.

Radio is a sort of mechanical back-fence gossip, utilizing the poisoned word, the slighting accent, the sarcastic tone and all those shades of meaning which are so much more available in appealing to the ear than in appealing to the eye. Added to its greater versatility of expression, it has the additional advantage of being able to avoid responsibility for what it says. It now seeks to have itself accepted on a par with newspapers as a medium for the dissemination of public information.

Withal it takes its news responsibilities so lightly that it is willing to discard them to win the pleasure of anyone who holds a position of political power. I do not believe that radio should be admitted to any parity with newspapers so far as having access to the press gallery or any other restricted source of news is concerned.

There are newspapers which I do not like. There are newspapers which do not like me. When either of us is moved to utter an opinion about the other, that opinion becomes a matter of printed record. Neither of us can or will try to hide behind a denial.

Free criticism is an inalienable right under free government. Full responsibility for that criticism is a moral responsibility which should be as inalienable as the right to make it.

There is now before the proper committee of this body a resolution calling for a full investigation into the conduct of the radio business in the United States. I introduced that resolution in the last Congress and it is still alive. No action has been taken upon it. Like many other matters pending before this Congress, no attention will be paid to it unless it has Presidential approval. Will the administration get Presidential approval of this?

Will the Rules Committee put that resolution upon its passage, and will the majority pass it and conduct a full and impartial investigation? No Member of this House who reads his mail can say that there is no public demand for such an investigation. You all know that there is, and you all know that the radio situation should be dealt with by Congress and that without further delay.

I sometimes feel that all that this House is, now that we have abandoned the Constitution, and resolved ourselves into a rubber stamp, is a sounding board and, even at that, we are restricted lest that sounding board produce something which, in the judgment of the administration of this House, should not be heard.

I know now that nothing I say upon this floor will receive the compliment of attention from the majority. I am listed as a "trouble maker", as a critic of all administrations, as one whose outlook upon life and affairs is through blue glasses.

That is not the truth. I am not against anyone, except as that person or group is against the interest of the public. I am a defender, not an assailant. I present my complaint against conditions to the House, fully and fairly in the RECORD, not by whispered innuendo or implied suggestion. I present my complaint, knowing that it will receive no attention from a majority which is blind because it will not see, which is deaf because it is forbidden to hear. I present my complaint so that it will be a matter of record. I fear that I am right in surmising that your decision will be against me and against the people for whom I speak. I know that I must appeal from your decision and that I am prepared to do. My appeal will be to the highest court in this land, one above any party or any official. That is the court of public opinion, whose next session will be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of next November.

When I speak of a new party, I do not mean any of the strange assortments of odd people who proclaim themselves to be political parties and who propound strange panaceas and programs of public conduct as the reason for their being. Those we have always with us. What I do mean is a great gathering of those men and women to whom America is more than a word, the Constitution more than an antique—that great middle class who are the sinew and backbone of this United States, that class of people who are being strangled at this moment by the policies under which you are being led.

The Republican Party itself was born out of the failure of Whigs and Democrats to meet the moral issues of 1856. The moral needs of 1934 will bring forth the answer to our political problem of today.

Gentlemen of the majority, I might be one of you if I chose. I was elected to this House upon the Democratic as well as upon the Republican ticket. I cannot join you. You do not carry your power gracefully. You have yet to learn moderation. Power is like alcohol. A little raises one's spirit to the heights. Too much puts body and soul in the gutter.

Ambition, too, is a thing that calls for moderation. Lucifer was ambitious to be the dictator of Heaven. Hell was created for his punishment.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GLOVER. The gentleman stated that he came back with the nomination of both the Republican Party and the Democratic Party, and now he says that there will be a third party. I wish to ask him if he will seek the endorsement of that third party?

Mr. McFADDEN. In the 1932 election I had a third-party endorsement, too. I am sure that my friend, the gentleman from Arkansas, will want to join that third party, and I shall be glad to see him there. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I notice that all the Republican brethren on his side are applauding him vociferously. Are these the same gentlemen who awhile ago took away the gentleman's committee assignments and spanked him every day—are they the same individuals?

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman from Texas is pretty well acquainted with them, and I will say that I am sure he can answer that question better than I can; but out of deference to him, I will say that some of them are.

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad that the gentleman is getting back in their good graces. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CASTELLOW].

Mr. CASTELLOW. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, at least I am in a position to sympathize with you at this late hour in our deliberations today. Those present, according to my observation, were practically all here at the meeting of the House at noon.

I have listened with great interest not only to the discussion today but to the multitude of discussions for more than 7 months in the aggregate. I have been highly entertained as well as instructed by these discussions. This afternoon, in the early stages of the debate, there was a great deal of partisanship exhibited. I have never felt the necessity of casting a vote for the sole purpose of manifesting the fact that I am a Democrat. I am that by inheritance, I am that by environment, and I am a Democrat from principle.

Though I have made comparatively few political speeches, my present position being the second elective office to which I ever aspired, I did undertake during my campaign to express clearly my attitude. I recall making the remark to a group of friends in the beginning: "If it is your desire to elect a man to Congress for the sole purpose of endeavoring to destroy the Republican Party, pass me by. If it is your wish that his time be devoted exclusively to party consideration, it would at least be wise to prefer another; but, if his time and thought are to be devoted in an effort to ameliorate the condition of our country, I would be pleased to undertake the service."

It occurs to me that it is not so important when two horses are pulling tandem as to which shall go first. It is important that the goods be delivered. The difficulties confronting us are certainly of sufficient gravity to enlist the best efforts of every true American without regard to party affiliations. In a successful solution of these problems there will be glory enough for all. To me there would be infinitely more satisfaction in the knowledge that our people, without regard to partisanship or sectionalism, were again prosperous, contented, and happy than to occupy the most exalted position, either in party or State, with a knowledge of their misery. The entire Membership of this House, without regard to political views, should ever bear in mind that we are all passengers on the same ship—simply occupying different staterooms. When storm tossed, as at present, the question of paramount importance is the safety of the ship itself without which no passenger may survive. According to my observation there are certain fundamental principles underlying all things, and, may I submit that fundamental principles are more important than temporary expedients. As I have said before on the floor of this House, we have been unusually blessed by Providence in being permitted to enjoy the blessings of the choicest part of this earth in which to live, and if we find ourselves in difficulties, it cannot, as I have before remarked, be charged to that Providence which has been so kind and beneficent but to our own short-sightedness. While never attempting oratory, I trust that at least I have done my share of independent thinking.

In an effort to convey more clearly certain views entertained as to the causes of some of our difficulties, I ask your indulgence while I relate a conversation with a friend some years ago. We both had cattle ranches at the time and concluded that possibly we could secure a better price by uniting and supplying a certain prospective purchaser with a larger number of cattle upon which to bid. While waiting for the arrival of our prospective purchaser it occurred to me to ask my friend this question: "Ben, do you consider that you are attending to business today or are you just frolicking?" He was a man who rarely indulged in recreation and whose chief pleasure was his business. Looking at me in a rather surprised way, he replied: "I consider that I am at least endeavoring to attend to business." I continued: "If our mutual friend, Mr. Sealy, were up here with his hounds chasing a fox, would you say that he was attending to business or frolicking?" With emphasis, he rejoined: "Of course, he would be frolicking." "Thank you", I replied, "I wanted to know your mental reactions to these two propositions, and then, too, I have a few more questions to ask."

"If you make $500 today out of this stockman, as I hope you will, are you going to spend it in addition to what you would spend if you do not make it?" "Oh, no; not at all", he replied. "Will you permit your family to spend it, in addition to what they will spend if you do not make it? You know what I mean. You provide for your family most generously. You live in as splendid a home as you would feel comfortable in occupying; they ride in as expensive an automobile as would add to their pleasure." "Yes; I understand", he said, "and I would not." "If you thought they would spend it, would you be willing to make it?" "No", he replied, "I would not." "Very well", I continued, "if Mr. Sealy catches the fox, is he going to eat him?" "No, of course not." "Would he be willing for his family to eat him?" "Surely not." "If he thought his family would eat that fox, would he be willing to catch him?" "No, indeed." "Well", I asked, "what is the difference between you chasing $500 and Mr. Sealy chasing the fox?" For a moment he hesitated, but replied, "I do not believe there is much." "Much?" I said, "Is there any?" "Bryant, I must confess, I do not believe there is any." "Then why is it that you say you are attending to business and Mr. Sealy would be just frolicking?" "Well," he concluded, "I did not realize the import of what you were asking." I submitted to him then this rather direct question, which might possibly be worthy of the consideration of others: "Ben, do you know the rule whereby it is determined whether a man is engaged in the pursuit of business or simply indulging himself in sport?" He suggested that he had never considered the question. "Then, I will tell you where, in my opinion, the line of demarcation can be drawn. As long as it is necessary to labor to provide one's self and his family with the necessities of life, and even those luxuries necessary to maintain them in that strata of society and with that standard of living in which they find most pleasure and are most comfortable, just to that extent it is business, but when that point is exceeded, I say to you, it is no longer business—it becomes a game, a sport, pursued for the pleasure it affords and the satisfaction produced by excelling our fellow creatures."

What I desire to call to the attention of the House is that this character of sport may be responsible for much of America's troubles and a contributing cause to many of our perplexities and the distress of millions, for in America it became too easy to accumulate a fortune, too difficult to earn a living. We have failed to observe the rule by which we could differentiate between sport and true business. We enjoy doing that most in which we excel. There is nothing so pleasing to the great Paderewski as to be seated for hours at the piano. There would be nothing on this earth more irksome to me. He excels in that line. I do not. So that is possibly the reason why we have so many today indulging in business purely as a sport, so to speak. We refer to them and they characterize themselves as business men. But are they? Would it not be more accurate to simply say they are business sportsmen? Does anyone think that Mr. Ford today is really engaged in business in that sense to which I have referred? He knows, and we all know, that it is not necessary for him, Mr. Morgan, or Mr. Mellon, and thousands of others of even less wealth, to accumulate another dollar to afford them a surplus. It is not essential to Mr. Ford's financial independence to excel in the manufacture of automobiles, either in quantity or in quality. Then why is it that he works more diligently, perhaps, than any of his employees? It is because he enjoys the game and it has become essential to his happiness; nothing more and nothing less. Personally, I have no objection to any man getting the most he can out of life. I have no objection to their sport, to their entertainment, so long as it does not interfere with the business of others, the real business of life in providing its necessities and meeting its requirements.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CASTELLOW] has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. CASTELLOW. I do not know how many automobiles Mr. Ford can produce in a day, and I have not singled him out except for the purpose of illustration, but would it not be infinitely better even for Mr. Ford himself if, supposing he can produce a thousand cars a day, but the people are financially able to use only 100 per day, would it not be much better if Mr. Ford could only produce 500 per day and the people were financially able to consume 500? It would be better for Mr. Ford. It would be better for his customers; it would be better for all concerned.

We are now developing a thought; I submit there is much for our consideration just here. These problems confront us not only from the standpoint of the workingman but for the protection of the producer, and even those to whom we refer as capitalists. The real danger with which the latter class is menaced lies in their financial growth; Samsonlike, if permitted, might destroy themselves and others along with them. There is a truth just here to which I would direct attention. It is this: The average capitalist does not himself produce wealth. He does not produce dollars. He simply assembles them just as an automobile assembling plant assembles but does not produce a single part in the machine it supplies. Practically all wealth is produced by the men and women who labor, and they rarely find opportunity to assemble much of their earnings. The man who has accumulated his multiple of millions evidently has either paid those who really produced too little or charged those who consumed, too much, and probably both. The Government is now undertaking to supervise all classes of business from the highest to the lowest. This is a tremendous undertaking in a country the size of ours. It has been said that it was not intended the trees should grow into the heavens, and there likewise is a limit to all things.

So it occurs to me that if a proper supervisory control were exercised to prevent the inordinate growth of great enterprises and private fortunes by a limitation of profits, and a more equitable distribution of the burdens of Government, the operation of the natural laws of competition would sufficiently regulate the undergrowth in business as nature applies it to the forests. It has been my observation that, whether in private life or public, it behooves us ever to recognize the potency of these natural laws. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I hope before long the House will pass a resolution of protest against the action of Herr Hitler in persecuting the Jews in Germany. He has lost all the progress Germany has made toward a resumption of its prestige and its dignity by these acts of inhumanity and brutality. Through stupidity he seems to have blamed on one race all of the troubles of Germany which were caused by the war and the Treaty of Versailles, and he has exerted all the force of government to destroy that race. That great race cannot be destroyed. In attempting to destroy it he is destroying the good will of the world toward Germany and is keeping it from Germany for many years to come. The good will of the world is a precious possession. The bad will of the world is a powerful and relentless weapon.

Our Nation has been settled by so many who have come from Europe that every time a government in Europe strikes down humanity the shock comes right into our own homes, because our neighbors are affected.

The people in the city from which I come are willing to be patient. They have been patient in the present crisis because they have been expecting that any sensible people would quickly end these unbelievable punishments. The Jewish people are willing to suffer and to sacrifice, sacrifice for any cause of humanity. But, naturally, indignant as they are at this unthinkable and unexplainable action which calls upon their coreligionists to sacrifice everything that is dear to man on the altar of bigotry and senseless despotism they protest with all of their power against Mr. Hitler's policy of brutal and outrageous annihilation.

The peace of America depends upon her people being happy and contented under their Government. They expect their Government to represent at least humanity in international affairs. They appreciate that it cannot interfere with domestic affairs of Germany, but they expect it to enter a strong protest.

This they expect us to do for the benefit not of their coreligionists in Germany alone, but for the benefit of Germany itself. Their brothers in Germany have fought under the German flag and love it dearly. They seek but to reestablish the old spirit of Germany, and will make any sacrifice to regain for it its old glory and greatness.

I am strongly in favor of making representations. We have been patient, hoping that Mr. Hitler would change his policy, but as time advances he seems to have changed to a policy of greater bitterness, of greater vindictiveness, and greater misunderstanding of world sentiment and world attitude. I do hope that the Congress of the country which has spoken for liberty and humanity throughout the generations will lift its voice in an effort to have Mr. Hitler repeal the policy of Germany and redeem Germany's prestige in the eyes of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, and I feel like saying "gentlemen of the jury", because I have started addresses to juries that were as large as this gathering of Congressmen. Anyway, as one who on every occasion has voted to support the administration, I want today to take issue with certain actions of certain departments of the administration, so that at some future time I may be in the position either of having been mistaken in my present feelings and attitude, or being in the position where I will not have to say, "I told you so."

From the headlines of one of my home papers I read these words: "Pool to burn 10 percent of bluegrass seed." Now, this pool was organized under the old Federal Farm Loan Act. It bought approximately 2,000,000 bushels of bluegrass seed. They are now going to take 200,000 bushels of this seed, pile it on the farm of a gentleman named Spears, in Bourbon County, and burn it. In years to come I do not want to have it said I failed to raise my voice in Congress in disapproval of this act.

The purpose, of course, is to increase the price of what they have left. It may be that they will; but I, as one individual, want it clearly understood that I am not in favor of taking a thing you have produced and destroying it in order to create a market for the little bit you may have left. [Applause.] I say this with all friendliness toward every department of the administration. I believe in the new deal in this Government as sincerely as any advocate on this side of the aisle; but I want to say that long, long years ago the thing of greatest value that the savage mind could conceive was yellow, glittering gold, yet they learned the truth of the assertion that you must beware, for everything that glitters is not gold. Shakespeare summed it up most fittingly when he said, "All that glistens is not gold."

I want to say to my Democratic brethren on this side of the House that it is my sincere belief that everything that is proclaimed in the name of the new deal does not partake of the spirit of the new deal. I do not think all the things the various departments do partake of the spirit of the new deal; and I think this is one of the things that does not. As a matter of fact, I think it is a hang over of the Hoover principle. It has a tinge of the philosophy of the old administration that has stolen into the new. I say this because I read here where the manager of this pool down there sat one time on the Republican side of this House, but he was defeated for reelection by CAP R. CARDEN over here on the Democratic side of the House.

Now, let us see what is the value of this 200,000 bushels of bluegrass seed. Even on this depressed market it has a value of $3 a ton as fertilizer or as cow feed. The farmers down there could use it as fertilizer at $3 a ton, or to feed cattle. I do not know, but it seems to me it would be more sensible to use it that way. The newspaper report says that when they take it out to burn, it will cover from 12 to 15 acres of land and take 2 weeks to burn.

Suppose way back yonder—and I asked my friend from Texas what the name of the Egyptian was at whose house Joseph lived, but he could not remember—but anyway, suppose when he had that vision he had called in a member of his "brain trust"—and I say it with all deference to the "brain trust", for I believe we should have more brains in government—but he had called in one of the members of his "brain trust" and said, "I had a vision last night; I dreamed there were 7 fat cows and that 7 lean cows came and ate them up", and this member of the "brain trust" had said to him, "The thing for you to do is to cut the amount of steak off the fat cow that you want and throw the rest away."

I ask what would have happened when the lean years came on? I live in the bluegrass section. There are only two parts of the United States which produce bluegrass seed; that is, the bluegrass region of Kentucky and another small region around St. Joseph, Mo. Any farmer will tell you that you cannot depend on over 1 good year out of 5 years for this bluegrass. Now, because we have a temporary surplus we take it out and burn it. It may be all right. I am not saying it is not. But it does not fit in with what I have been taught in the past. I can remember when they used to teach the children the saying that "Willful waste makes woeful want, and I may live to see the day I'll need the crust I threw away." I do not think this policy has anything to do with the new-deal philosophy of government.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield to the eloquent gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Is it not a fact that the State of West Virginia has even more bluegrass than Kentucky?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. If the State of West Virginia has so much bluegrass they ought to advertise it a little bit, because if you talk to anyone from almost any State he will tell you that the State of West Virginia has not one sprig of bluegrass. If you have bluegrass you must have borrowed the bluegrass from the State of Kentucky, and the reason I do not want the seed burned is because I want some of the other States, like West Virginia, to borrow this bluegrass.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The State of West Virginia may have as much bluegrass as the State of Kentucky, but it has not as much of those other things that go with the bluegrass, that all together made Kentucky famous.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. No; it has not the things that make the bluegrass bluest in Kentucky.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. I am very much interested in the gentleman's statement, but in view of the announced policy of the Department of Agriculture and the one they continue to put into effect, of curtailing the production of all farm products and killing off the surplus hogs, and so forth, how can the gentleman say that this is not a part of the new deal?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I will say this: I am in favor of curtailed production. I am in favor of taking land out of production and letting it remain idle. But I am not in favor of producing something, storing it in a granary, and then burning it in order to get higher prices for the remainder.

Mr. MOTT. Is the gentleman in favor of killing off the surplus hogs?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. It depends on what use is made of the meat from the surplus. If the meat is used to feed the poor, I am in favor of that. This 200,000 bushels of bluegrass seed could be used to plant lawns in front of some of the homes of the poor families in this country, so that in the summertime the children could roll in bluegrass instead of in dirt.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am in hearty accord with what the gentleman said with respect to the destruction of seed or. in fact, anything of that type like corn or wheat that has been raised or the plowing under of cotton. Is it not a fact that this theory has come about as a result of the economic mind which has been grafted onto the new deal? The theorists, as I understand it, are predicating their whole theory on price levels, and the very basic thing that they have been counting on now is being shattered, as well as the method by which price levels are arrived at. For instance, Professor Jones, of Columbia, in his recent book entitled "Horses and Apples" has largely exploded the theory upon which Tugwell, Warren, and others are operating. In other words, the manner in which price levels are made up are well known to be erroneous, so the foundation of all of these schemes of that type is being shaken and taken out from under.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I appreciate the gentleman's remarks, but this is using up my 10 minutes. I do not think it is right to burn bluegrass seed as long as there are barren yards in this country that ought to have grass in them. I do not think it is right to destroy pork when there are hungry mouths to feed, and I do not think it is right to destroy cotton when there are poor people to be clothed.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DEEN].

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in this bluegrass discussion of the gentleman from Kentucky, but I have been more particularly interested in the discussion during the day with reference to the C.W.A., P.W.A., and other work in connection with the new deal. There is something in which all of us are more interested perhaps than in bluegrass just at this moment, and I am not discrediting the gentleman's splendid speech. The thing I desire to bring to the attention of the Members on both sides of the aisle for the moment is this: As a member of the Committee on Education I have studied rather extensively the school situation in our country at this time.

I believe that there is an emergency in the educational system of the various States of the country. There are at this time 200,000 teachers whose salaries for 1933–34 are less than $750 per year. There are 85,000 teachers whose salaries are $450 or less. There are 45,000 teachers whose salaries are less than $350 for the year 1933–34.

Someone has said that this is a matter for the States to take care of. I admit, and, of course, we all know, that under the Constitution and under our system of public education the various States must look after their own school systems; but, recognizing the emergency which exists, the senior Senator from my State, Senator GEORGE, introduced in the Senate on the 19th of January a bill providing immediately for $150,000,000 to be granted by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, $50,000,000 to meet the emergency existing in the schools in the several States for the fiscal year 1933–34 and $100,000,000 for the fiscal year 1934–35.

Before introducing this bill, the distinguished senior Senator from my State, Senator GEORGE, had studied the educational situation throughout the country, and in the bill there is a provision that at least $50,000,000 of this money shall be made available in the immediate future.

Permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, the Army and the Navy of this Nation do not constitute the greatest defense for the Nation, neither do the farms or the industries of the country constitute its greatest fortification. In my judgment, the most powerful and the most potent factor in civilization is good citizenship, and it is for good citizenship that millions of dollars are spent in our country for public education.

In this connection let me say that the youth of our land is the greatest and most powerful potentiality that we have. The teachers of this country this day, and I want it on record as January 31, 1934, have owing to them the sum of approximately $40,000,000 in unpaid salaries. I yield to no person anywhere in love, admiration, and respect for the veterans of the wars. I yield to no man greater respect for the workers in the Federal Government, but I have heard on the floor of this Chamber, until my heart has been made heavy, of the sacrifices of the workers in the Federal Government, when in the State of Kentucky, which grows your fine bluegrass, there are 1,000 teachers today in your public schools whose salaries for 6 months are less than $35 per month. Your own State school superintendent, Dr. James Richmond, told me 2 days ago that your own capital city, Frankfort, Ky., must close 1 month short of its 9 months' term for lack of funds.

The teachers to whom $40,000,000 is now due and unpaid have made their part of the sacrifice for the new deal. In my county the high school in my town, for a lack of funds, closed in December, has not reopened and will not for some time. One principal of a county high school in my county has been paid $100 in 4 months.

Mr. McCLINTIC and Mr. RANDOLPH rose.

Mr. DEEN. I yield first to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McCLINTIC. The gentleman is making a good speech and I am in accord with his views. I saw a statement a short time ago which was to the effect that the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would ask for additional funds or for continuation of the life of that organization on the ground he was interested in the railroads. Does not the gentleman think it would be far more beneficial for us to widen the scope of that legislation so as to allow teachers' warrants to be used as a medium for obtaining loans, so that these weak schools that have not been able to carry on can receive this kind of financial support?

Mr. DEEN. I agree with the gentleman, absolutely, that the unpaid warrants of the teachers of this country, backed by the property, the resources, and the morale of our citizens in every State, are just as good collateral for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as the bonds and assets of any and all railroads in the United States.

Mr. McCLINTIC. In fact, it is better than the securities of the railroads.

Mr. DEEN. The gentleman is right.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I have introduced such a bill and I hope the committee having jurisdiction will allow us to widen the scope of the authority of that Corporation.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEEN. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I heartily agree with what the gentleman is saying about the seriousness of our school situation, not only in the State of Kentucky, but also in the State of West Virginia. My colleague from the State of Kentucky would not rise to the defense of West Virginia bluegrass, and I simply want to say that I rise to his defense and want to suggest that they might pay off those teachers in Kentucky with the bluegrass seed from that State.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEEN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DUNN. Does the gentleman know how many teachers there are in the United States now teaching without compensation?

Mr. DEEN. I have not the figures on that, but I do know that the C.W.A. is now advancing, and has been for some time, approximately $2,000,000 per month to the boards of education and State superintendents so as to give employment to teachers who have not been employed. Forty thousand teachers, I believe, have been taken care of under this fund.

Mr. DUNN. May I also tell the gentleman that I have introduced a bill providing help for teachers in the United States who have not been paid their salaries and I hope the committee that has this bill will give it favorable consideration.

Mr. DEEN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEEN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I am in hearty accord with what the gentleman has said, and intend to support any measure that comes here to aid the schools. I do not like to take the gentleman's time for this purpose, but my friend, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], thinks I should have helped him out on his bluegrass, but I want to say to the House that the reason I did not do so is because the kind of bluegrass they have in West Virginia we call crabgrass in Kentucky. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. DEEN. I wish to say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] in connection with the discussion of bluegrass or crabgrass that in the southern part of Georgia we have a great deal of grass that is known as "bull grass", in which we sometimes sow cowpeas, but it does not always make the best of hay.

I want to say in conclusion that here is a telegram which came from the State of Alabama a week ago:

> Every school, white and Negro, will be closed in 24 out of 67 counties by February 15 * * * Many of these schools already closed. Some few have reopened on subscription or other basis. Also by February 15 all schools will be closed in 13 of 45 cities. This includes Montgomery city and county schools.

May I say that I believe the passage of this bill, S. 2402, introduced in the Senate by Senator GEORGE, of Georgia, is imperative, and I hope the Senate will act on it and it will come to this body promptly and that the Membership of this House will join hands and hearts for the passage of the bill, which is of such vital welfare to the country.

Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that I believe the time is now here when this branch of the Federal Government might give consideration to the importance of a national equalization school fund to be made up from a tax to be levied on tax-exempt securities, to be put in a fund in the Treasury for educational purposes and appropriated to the various States without any supervision or control by the Federal Government. No one wants anyone in the South to read a textbook saying that Robert E. Lee was a traitor to the Federal Government. Nobody wants to see portrayed in history a statement of that kind. [Applause.]

It is therefore exceedingly important that there be no Federal control or supervision over public education in the several States. The Federal Government, through the Bureau of Roads, is assisting in the building of highways. It is equally as important that the Federal Government participate in the education of the public-school children of the Nation. Congress should enact into legislation the joint resolution which I recently introduced, House Joint Resolution 219, providing for the taxing of incomes from what is known as tax-exempt securities.

Billions of dollars are invested at the present time in tax-exempt bonds. The holders of the bonds clip their coupons, receive their dividends, and pay no taxes. If the proper tax were placed on the incomes from bonds a substantial fund could be maintained for public-school education, appropriated to the several States on a per capita or attendance basis.

I therefore hope that all members who are interested in this matter will add their support to the program provided for in Senate bill 2402, introduced by Senator GEORGE, of Georgia, and will support House Joint Resolution 219, which I introduced in the House on January 5.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE].

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, much has been said lately about the veterans' legislation in the House, and it might not be inappropriate for me to bring your attention to the history of veterans' legislation.

In one instance today I heard the words "careless legislation" used by one speaker. I want to correct this impression if it exists.

I was elected to the Sixty-seventh Congress. In the Sixty-eighth Congress I helped to form a Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. That committee was carefully selected on behalf of the majority and minority sides.

The chairman was Royal C. Johnson, of South Dakota; the other majority members were Snyder, of New York; Luce, of Massachusetts; Vaile, of Colorado; Perkins, of New Jersey; Fitzgerald, of Ohio; McLaffery, of California; Vincent of Michigan; Welsh of Pennsylvania; Simmons, of Nebraska; and Robinson, of Iowa.

On the Democratic side were Carl Hayden, of Arizona; Cullen, of New York; I was from North Carolina; Rankin, of Mississippi; Jeffers, of Alabama; Milligan, of Missouri; Connery, of Massachusetts; Tydings, of Maryland. Later on, after vacancies occurred, Members like Mrs. Norton, of New Jersey; and Mrs. Rogers, of Massachusetts, were members of the committee. One of the first meetings—and I am now speaking to you today of presumptive cases—one of the first meetings was held in 1924. Prior to the organization of this committee, the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House had charge of all veterans' legislation, and the original act provided for 2 years' presumptive cases in the case of tuberculosis and neuropsychiatric diseases and some others.

The third Sweet bill, as it was called, extended that presumption from 2 to 3 years, and the question which was largely before the committee when we organized was the question of a longer time for presumption. The American Legion's representative, through Watson B. Miller, brought experts before the committee, and I am speaking of tuberculosis first. It was then 1924. All over the country many men had tuberculosis who could not get into the hospitals. They had this dread disease and were lying around in the various communities, suffering and dying. One of the first witnesses before the committee was one of the greatest tuberculosis experts in the United States, Dr. Kenneth Dunham, of Cincinnati. Dr. Dunham had performed more autopsies on lungs than probably any man in the United States and he knew as much about lungs, as far as tuberculosis is concerned, as any man in the Nation. Dr. Dunham recommended at least the presumptive time be extended to 5 years. The second Sweet bill had a presumption of 3 years, mandatory, and the Director of the Veterans' Bureau could not go beyond that time. Not only in the cities but all over this country in many of the isolated cases, these men were suffering from tuberculosis and were not examined, were not close to physicians, and had no tuberculosis experts to examine them. We saw the condition that existed, and General Hines himself, the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, asked that the presumptive time be kept at 3 years, but that the Director be given discretion to extend that time so that if anybody came in a short time after the 3-year period it was in the discretion of the Director whether that should be considered a service-connected presumptive case.

There was filed in the record any amount of evidence from the Veterans' Bureau physicians and from physicians in various hospitals in the United States. All showed without a doubt that you could not tell about the dread disease of tuberculosis in a year, but that it would even break out 5 years after a man had contracted it. It is never cured, no matter what anybody says. It is first apparently arrested and then physicians classify it as arrested. But you can take any man who has had tuberculosis and if you overload him he will break down just as certain as he is living. It is a case of a 6-cylinder automobile trying to run on 4 cylinders and overloading. It goes to pieces pretty soon. Overloading can come not only from labor but it can come from the mental condition. If a man who has had an arrested case of tuberculosis knows that in the future he cannot provide a living for himself and family, then that man is certain to break, and no power on earth can stop it save the power of restoring his mental condition back to normal. I speak more now of tuberculosis because I went into these hospitals in the United States, some three or four of them, and made an investigation. I have seen these men suffer. I have seen them lie there, and I have seen them go, as it was called in those days, into "St. Peter's" ward, knowing that the end would come for them in only 2 or 3 weeks' time.

I call this to the attention of the Committee because there is much misunderstanding about presumptive cases, both in the neuropsychiatric cases and in some of the others. The law should be remedied so that these men can come back, to a 3-year presumption at the least, if not a 5-year presumption. [Applause.] If that is not done, then I say to you there will be many more tubercular graves in the United States.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman is making a very interesting statement. I agree with what he has said. The gentleman speaks of the 5-year presumptive period. Does he mean to 1925 or to 1923?

Mr. BULWINKLE. 1923. Or 5 years after discharge from the service.

Mr. PATMAN. You want to bring the period up to 1923?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes. And also 5 years after discharge from the service.

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman think that the testimony introduced at the time would justify bringing it up to 1925 as it was before?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. In the case of these tubercular cases and the neuropsychiatric cases, does the gentleman not think it would be justified to make it January 1, 1925?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes; I do. No one not in the service can realize the mental strain that many of these men went through. I have seen them break down. Just after the armistice my battalion was ordered out to clear up a whole sector around there. The first thing was to hunt for the dead and the wounded. We found on one barbed-wire fence the bodies of a number of Frenchmen, shot by machine guns, caught in that wire, dying a death as bad if not worse than the death on the cross. Some of these boys could not stand it. Sooner or later their mental condition will be affected. Through occurrences like that, in 1946 you will find there will be 50,000 former service men with mental ailments in the hospitals in the United States or in the county homes and in jails. These men must be taken care of. The people of the United States expect you to take care of them, and the Congress of the United States does, and I know when it is properly brought to the attention of the President they will be taken care of. [Applause.]

Mr. PATMAN. At this time those who are in the hospitals, with service-connected ailments, receive only $15 a month, their compensation having been reduced to that. Would the gentleman give them full compensation or would he let that figure remain?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes; in some instances it should be increased.

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman mean with the neuropsychiatric cases?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I was referring particularly to the tubercular cases. Does the gentleman refer to the neuropsychiatrics?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The neuropsychiatric does not need much money, but he needs a little. He needs a little to play with. He needs a little to buy tobacco and fruit with. It will help him a great deal. I am also thinking of the man who lies on the bed with the white plague. His mind is entirely on the sufferings and privation of his family.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman permit to be included in his remarks the statement that by granting these men presumptive connection and then withdrawing it from them we do them a greater injustice than if we had never originally given them the grant, for the reason that they are now in a position where they cannot go back to records and establish direct connection which they might have done had they been compelled to do so at that time?

Mr. BULWINKLE. These tubercular men would have suffered a great deal anyway; but when you take it away from them, when they have no hope in life, it is pretty hard.

Mr. SWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. SWICK. Has there ever been any evidence produced to show that this presumptive period should be less than 5 years?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I have never heard of any at all.

Mr. SWICK. From any reliable source?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I have never heard of any. I want to say to this House that the committee gave serious consideration to this matter. Dr. Minor, of Asheville, who is now dead, but who was a great tubercular expert, at first did not believe in the 5 years, but before it was ended he told me it was one of the best pieces of legislation that we had passed for the service man.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. With reference to tubercular patients: They cannot get jobs anywhere, and they cannot be placed except in hospitals. Industry will not employ them. As far as they are concerned, would it not be well for the Government to give them a standing, regardless of any time?

Mr. BULWINKLE. The gentleman is correct. Those men cannot get jobs. Nobody will hire a man who has been branded as a tubercular. Unfortunately, in the beginning, shortly after 1919 or 1920, men who were suffering from other causes were branded as tuberculars, and life was made miserable for them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] has again expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. UNDERWOOD] as he may desire.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I always listen with much interest and give thoughtful consideration to the remarks of my distinguished colleague from North Carolina, Mr. BULWINKLE, who has just preceded me, but I desire in the time allotted to me to approach the question of veterans' legislation from another angle.

As the chairman of the oldest pension committee of the Congress, I have for many years given earnest consideration to the subject of emoluments of all kinds benefiting the veterans and their dependents. On January 3, the opening of this session of Congress, I introduced in the House H.R. 6206, of which section 1103 provides that it may be cited as the "Veterans' Act of 1934." That I have been sympathetic to the just demands of the veterans is evidenced by my record. Since my election to the Congress 12 years ago I have been in practically constant contact with them and their dependents.

Much has recently been said about the Government's policy in the matter of veterans' relief. Not all that has been said is based upon facts; therefore, many of the conclusions reached are erroneous. However, it is my conviction that in justice to all concerned, the taxpayer as well as the veteran, the existing legislation governing veterans' relief should be coordinated, classified, and simplified into one code which will discard present inequalities and place all veterans of similar age and suffering similar disabilities upon the same basis with respect to the benefits extended, whether it be pensions, hospitalization, or domiciliary care. I consider such action desirable at the present time, not only because of the necessity for strict economy in Government expenditures but because of the present administrative necessity to simplify operative procedure.

It is my honest opinion that a codification and simplification of the present system would save millions of dollars for the taxpayers of the country and do justice to the veteran and his dependents.

It would seem to me that we should give first consideration to the principles involved with the hope of evolving certain sound policies dealing with the problem.

We all recognize the Government's moral obligation of taking care of the veteran and his dependents who through service has suffered disability or an aggravation of a preexisting disability which prevents him from carrying on after service.. Likewise it has been the policy of our Government to care for its veterans when they have reached the time of life where they are unable to carry on. No one questions the desire of our people to deal generously and fairly with all veterans. We are all proud of the fact that our Government has been able to grant relief to our veterans, and the taxpayers will make no complaint as to the cost of such relief provided these expenditures go to those who are deserving.

Service to one's country cannot be measured in terms of dollars and cents. Gratitude to those who have served their country cannot be expressed under any policy we might adopt, but we can devise a system of veterans' relief which will insure that benefits are granted equitably to those who are entitled thereto.

My aim in drafting H.R. 6206 was to submit to the Congress and the country a sound national policy. This policy contemplates that those given Government benefits be placed upon an honor roll; that this national obligation extends, first, to those having disabilities incurred in or aggravated by military service; and, second, to those who, while not suffering from disabilities directly attributable to military service, have become, through age or disability, unable to carry on for themselves.

I am firmly of the opinion that if all benefits are equalized and awarded upon correct principles, and administrative costs kept within reasonable bounds, all that can be expected in the way of economies will follow. I am sure that we all fully subscribe to the policy of dealing fairly with those who have served our Nation in times of great emergency. The bill I have introduced is in keeping with that policy.

Many years ago I advocated a uniform policy, and several years ago I drafted the framework of this present bill. After careful consideration of its every provision, I admit, owing to human frailty, it may not be a perfect bill, and I have never seen a perfect bill, yet I do maintain that its principles are just, and it substitutes for the present jumble and disjointed pension legislation a comprehensive and permanent uniform national policy which is applicable to the future as well as to the present.

There is no thought of criticism of Congress for the imperfections in the legislation governing existing benefits. Each enactment or amendment to existing legislation has been in response to urgent representations and demands of different groups. In many instances these demands were so insistent and immediate in character as to preclude deliberate consideration and action such as might have evolved more uniform provisions. I believe the chief cause for these inequalities and injustices was the fact that all earlier legislation had to be taken up piecemeal, as it were, and the needs of each group of veterans had to be handled separately, because the benefits were dispensed or administered by many different Government agencies and legislation pertaining to their affairs was handled by several different committees in both Houses of Congress. For these reasons it was impracticable for Congress to attempt to arrange all groups of veterans and benefits in classes for comparative study and then to correct or eliminate certain features by one piece of legislation.

I do not know whether or not this bill can be enacted into law this Congress, but it is my sincere belief and I am certain that the Congress must ultimately enact such legislation.

This proposed legislation is not destructive of the present governmental policy with respect to veterans' affairs. It repeals and modifies all prior laws concerning veterans' relief, but it does so only for the purpose of substituting a just, permanent, and uniform national policy.

The Economy Act was admittedly enacted with the greatest of haste in the face of an emergency. That there are inequalities in the kind and character of the benefits extended to the veterans of different wars under the present laws is undeniable. Veterans are thrown together in their organization meetings, work, and social life, and are familiar with the patent injustices that exist; hence dissatisfaction and complaints increase.

So long as the Economy Act remains the law, there will be constant attempts to amend it for the benefit of some special classes; hence I feel that it is urgent that the Government adopt a definite national policy at the earliest pracical date, before the pressure of some of these special classes destroy every benefit contained in the Economy Act.

Many changes have been suggested by various organizations for the consideration of the Congress, the adoption of which would tend to multiply the present inequalities and increase the annual budget for veterans' relief. If inequalities and inconsistencies in existing laws are to be corrected and expenditures kept within reasonable bounds, steps having to do with veterans' legislation must be taken only after the most careful consideration.

I have burned the candle long hours, doing intensive research work in an effort to reach a just and sympathetic conclusion concerning veterans' legislation. When the Economy Act was under consideration, there was no time to take advantage of the results of investigations made by me during the course of years in Congress, and by others qualified to deal with the problems of our veterans, and determine a definite national policy with respect thereto.

My bill, H.R. 6206, substitutes a definite plan in specific terms for the broad, general, and uncertain terms of the Economy Act, but it does not do away with any of the just principles that are contained in the Economy Act and section 20 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, and the executive regulations issued to carry out the provisions of the Economy Act, which are beneficial to the veterans and their dependents.

I have drafted into one bill, which if enacted, will codify into one law, all the pension provisions hitherto scattered throughout the statutes and enacted as far back as July 14, 1862.

This bill is so drafted in form that it can be readily amended or expanded to meet changing conditions. For once the veteran will be able to pick up one single law and by a brief examination thereof, determine definitely what his rights, as a veteran, are.

The underlying principles of my bill are to bring together under a Cabinet officer, all governmental activities having to do with veterans' relief of whatever character, and with a view of securing a better coordination, added efficiency, and a more complete economic use of existing facilities and to improve the service rendered to the veterans of all wars and equalize the benefits extended them by the Government.

Having once adopted the fundamental principles of a national policy, our efforts should then be directed to the administration of such a policy by the shortest and most direct route.

It is the clear duty of the Congress to get the greatest possible results in services for the money available for a specific purpose.

It is quite evident from the viewpoint of national policy and a balanced Budget that the veterans' relief problem merits the most careful consideration of the legislative and executive branches of the Government.

Any governmental agency disbursing annually since its inception nearly a billion dollars must of necessity attract public attention in prosperous times as well as when enforced economies in national expenditures are under consideration.

Anyone who is familiar with the present activities of the Veterans' Administration knows that there is a considerable duplication of functions and that they should operate on a considerably reduced personnel, which would result in increased savings and simplification of operative procedure.

When one considers that there are approximately 35,000 employees in the Veterans' Administration and that the expenditures are approximately one half of the total revenue of the Government, it is my opinion that it is proper and timely that this governmental activity should be placed under the head of a Cabinet officer, who would be the directing head of a department that would rank alongside of the other great administrative departments of our Government.

This Cabinet officer would be in a position to secure better results for both the taxpayers and the veterans and would be in a position at all times to visualize to the President and the Congress the picture of veterans' benefits, which would result in a more simplified procedure and consequently greater economies.

Looking back over the old reports of the Bureau of Pensions, I find from 1891 to 1894, inclusive, they had the largest number of employees at any one time in their service. This large number of employees for that service is a surprisingly low figure of 2,009. At that time they were paying pensions based on services rendered during the Revolutionary War, our early Indian wars, War of 1812, War with Tripoli, Mexican War, Civil War, and various Indian campaigns. They were, even with the low rate of pensions paid at that time, disbursing $140,000,000 annually direct to veterans and their dependents. The 2,009 employees received $2,508,810 average salaries during those years. The entire cost of the operation, which included medical service, supplies, equipment, field service, and maintenance, averaged only $4,898,665 for those years.

In 1898 the peak of Civil War pensions was reached when the Bureau had 745,822 Civil War veterans on the pension rolls and a total number of pensioners of 993,714. It disbursed $145,000,000 with only 1,836 employees, who were paid in salaries $2,281,710. The expenses of the Bureau for that year were $4,114,000.

It is interesting to note that from 1868 to 1931, inclusive, when the old Bureau of Pensions was consolidated with the present Veterans' Administration, that, although the Bureau disbursed more than eight and one-half billions of dollars in the form of pensions to veterans and their dependents, the cost of maintenance and expenses of all descriptions for the operation was only $152,957,460.46.

It is disclosed in volume 4, pages 1125, 1126, 1127, of the hearings before the Joint Congressional Committee on Veterans' Affairs, held February 24, 1933, that there were 857 attorneys employed by the Bureau, whose salaries ranged from $2,600 to $9,000, and they also had employed 1,584 full-time physicians, whose salaries range from $2,600 to $9,000.

I have a proviso in my bill which transfers the administration of the civil-service retirement fund from the Veterans' Administration to the Civil Service Commission. This activity has no more connection with veterans than any other group of citizens, but the charge is made against veterans' relief in the appropriation bill, when not one cent of that money does the veteran or his dependents an iota of good.

The Veterans' Administration was authorized as an independent agency by act of July 3, 1930; and by Executive order of July 21, 1930, there were consolidated therein under a single control the Bureau of Pensions, the United States Veterans' Bureau, and the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs has control, direction, and management of all agencies and activities comprising the Veterans' Administration; is chairman of the Federal Board of Hospitalization; is responsible for extending relief to veterans and dependents of veterans in the way of pensions, Government military and naval insurance, adjusted compensation, emergency officers' retirement pay, and hospital and domiciliary care; also administration of Civil Service retirement law, and settlement of claims for annuities, refunds, and allowances under said law.

The Veterans' Administration, in addition to its central office in Washington, with 5,052 employees, operates regional offices or combined regional offices and hospitals in every State, except Delaware, and maintains and operates 72 hospitals and 14 soldiers' homes, necessitating services of 30,415 employees. Salaries for this army of employees totaled $58,528,639 for 1933.

This independent establishment disbursed $868,688,479.42 in 1933. It paid pensions, compensation, disability allowances, and emergency officers' retirement pay to 997,918 veterans and 272,749 dependents of veterans; gave hospital medical service to 136,626 veterans and out-patient medical service to 256,652 individuals; and took care of 24,225 veterans in soldiers' homes.

To June 30, 1933, it acted upon 3,990,674 applications for adjusted compensation involving $3,717,487,218.21. It was concerned in life insurance of 637,049, the value of whose insurance was $2,925,618,222.52.

When consideration is given to the fact that the disbursements of the Veterans' Administration are far in excess of those of any other departments of the Government, except the Post Office Department, which largely depends on postal revenues for running expenses; that in its many and diversified activities, involving monetary benefits of various kinds, insurance annuities, adjusted compensations, hospitalization, domiciliary care, construction of hospitals, and so forth, it directly contacts several millions of our people, and indirectly benefits many more millions; that in point of numbers of employees it is exceeded by only four of our Government activities, one of which is our great Postal Service—the conclusion must be that so great an activity of our Government should constitute a department with a Cabinet official, the Pension Department, with a Secretary, an Assistant Secretary in charge of monetary benefits for veterans, and an assistant secretary in charge of hospitalization, domiciliary care, and similar activities. To such a department might be assigned those activities now existent, and that may be brought into being, that carried grants of benefits to our civilian population, as compensation, annuities, old-age pensions, and so forth. Such a department could work out systems that would be uniform in character, formulate legislation that would be equitable to all beneficiaries, and bring order out of the present chaos of the hodge-podge of laws, regulations, and so forth, that are difficult of administration and so exasperating in their inequalities as to stir up wide-spread dissatisfaction that bodes no good to any party that may be in power.

The President's Cabinet is his official family, the members of which meet on Tuesdays and Fridays to consider and discuss important matters. Opportunity is afforded for exchange of views, a determination as to how projects advanced by one Cabinet officer may affect the Departments presided over by other Cabinet officers, and opportunity afforded for coordination and the elimination of overlappings and duplications. It surely cannot be gainsaid that the Veterans' Administration has so many great problems and such vast and far-reaching activities that opportunity should be afforded the heads of Departments at Cabinet meetings to consider them, and to bring this about means the creation of a pension department. Examination of cabinet set-ups in other great nations reveals that to certain ministers or secretaries are assigned portfolios dealing with pensions. This is practically true of Great Britain and France, and even our neighbor to the north of us, Canada, has its Minister of Pensions. In Great Britain, under the Secretary for Home Affairs, are centered war pensions, old-age pensions, national health and unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, hospitalization, and kindred public social services.

The most urgent need at the present time is a codification of pension laws. This necessity has been realized for some years past, but never more so than since the passage of the so-called "Economy Act", which repealed all laws granting pensions since the beginning of the War with Spain, April 21, 1898, and has resulted in the granting of pensions pursuant to Executive orders and regulations, which have been changed several times and in the administration of which there have been reviews upon reviews, delays, confusion, and a piling up of work within the Veterans' Administration almost to the point of demoralization of service, and wide-spread discontent throughout the length and breadth of the land in the ranks of all classes of veterans and their widows and dependents.

Then there are different laws granting pensions to Civil War veterans and their widows, to Indian war veterans and their widows, to soldiers for disability incurred in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps prior to April 21, 1898, and to widows and dependents by reason of deaths of such soldiers from peace-time service-connected causes—all carrying different rates of pension. In place of this hodge-podge of laws, orders, and regulations there should be enacted laws granting uniform benefits which might be administered along lines of simplicity and directness, and with that same degree of economy and efficiency as marked the operations of the old Pension Bureau during its existence of almost 100 years.

My bill H.R. 6206, is a step in the right direction and a long stride toward the goal of a safe, sane, and uniform pension system administered by a head clothed with the dignity and powers of a Cabinet official.

For the information of the Membership of the House and others concerned it is my purpose to present herewith a résumé of my bill H.R. 6206:

THE UNDERWOOD BILL (H.R. 6206)—VETERANS' ACT OF 1934

TITLE II—PART I

PENSION FOR NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY

Civil War and Indian campaigns service

Section 201: Provides for the continuance of laws in effect as to the non-service-connected disabilities for Civil War veterans (act of June 9, 1930—$75 and $100 per month) and Indian campaign veterans (act of Mar. 3, 1927—$20 to $50 per month), continues laws in effect as to widows of Civil War veterans ($50 per month if wife during service, $40 per month if married subsequent to service and prior to June 27, 1905 and 70 years of age, $30 per month if married subsequent to service and prior to June 27, 1905, and not 70 years of age), and proposes to grant a pension of $30 per month to widows of Civil War veterans who married the veteran on or after June 27, 1905, and prior to June 27, 1910, and who lived and cohabited with such veteran for a period of 5 years. This section also proposes to extend the age limit of minors from 16 to 18 years of age and to include those children who have been insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless since prior to attaining the age of 18 years.

I deem this an opportune time to make some explanation of the much-misunderstood provisions of existing law relative to the pensioning of helpless children of veterans. None of the laws now in existence provides for the pensioning of helpless children as such, but merely provides for the continuance of pension granted them as minor children. If they were lucky enough to have their veteran fathers die before they attained the age of 16 years and they succeeded in having a claim filed before reaching that age they were all right; but if they were unlucky enough to have their veteran fathers survive until they had attained the age of 16 years, their only recourse was to a special act of Congress.

TITLE II—PART II

If totally disabled, regardless of age, $30 per month.
If 55 years of age, regardless of disability, $12.
If 62 years of age, regardless of disability, $18.
If 68 years of age, regardless of disability, $24.

If 78 years of age, regardless of disability, $50.
If 80 years of age, regardless of disability, $60.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN].

(Mr. KOPPLEMANN, by unanimous consent, was granted permission to revise and extend his remarks, and to include certain detail figures and data.)

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, I have before me a set of figures made public today by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. They are significant enough to dumfound our American milk producers and shock the milk consumer. These figures relate to net profits of milk-distributors in four of America's largest milk-consuming cities. These cities are Boston, Philadelphia, St. Louis, and Chicago, and cover distributors handling from two thirds to 90 percent of the milk in these cities.

The figures are the result of an audit recently completed by auditors for the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and cover the business operations of these milk-distributing companies from 1929 to the end of 1933.

I ask to have the detailed figures of this audit incorporated with my remarks, so that all of my colleagues, the general public, and the farmers may know who is skimming the cream off the dairymen's milk checks.

Before I discuss what these figures are I want to point out some significant facts. From 1929 to 1932 the wholesale price of milk sold by farmers declined 50 percent. During that same period the gross income of American farmers from dairy products produced on their farms declined 46 percent. During the last few months we have heard much about the sad plight of the dairy farmer. For several years he has been driven to the wall, and now he is feeling the squeeze. His voice is being lifted for help. Profits from his business have disappeared. I know from figures in Connecticut, my own State, that while labor income on 30 of the best farms averaged $1,719 in 1929, the average labor income on these same 30 farms was minus $244 in 1932. And while I do not have the figures for 1933 I am certain that these dairymen, in common with others throughout the whole country, suffered serious losses in their business, the majority of them unable to pay their cash expenses.

During this same period from 1929 to the end of 1933 the milk distributors of this country have been making enormous profits out of the farmers. I will not take the time to recite the profits made by milk distributors in each of the four milk sheds. These figures will appear in a table as part of my remarks. But I will give you a composite of the figures from 1929 to 1933.

In 1929 the milk distributors in Boston, Philadelphia, St. Louis, and Chicago made a net profit averaging 29.48 percent; in 1930 these same distributors made a net profit of 34.37 percent; in 1931 it was 30.56 percent; in 1932, 18.43 percent; in 1933, 15.13 percent.

The average net profit for the 5-year period was 25.71 percent, or a total of $62,456,553 net profit on a total net plant investment of $242,971,189.

Mr. Chairman, these figures speak for themselves.

Average yield, net profit, percent	25.84	22.45	30.76	14.64	25.71

EXPLANATION OF FOREGOING FIGURES

The audit of milk distributors' books by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration reveals a yield on the net plant investment for the 5 years ending December 31, 1933, as follows:

	Percent
Philadelphia (distributors handling 85 percent of volume)	30.76
Boston (distributors handling 75 percent of volume)	22.45
St. Louis (distributors handling 67 percent of volume)	14.64
Chicago (distributors handling 90 percent of volume)	25.84

The percentage of yield which represents net profit was based upon the net plant investment which was arrived at by the auditors after the elimination of certain items from the schedules. Items eliminated from the net plant investment included appraisal appreciation, idle property, and adjustment of excessive reserves for depreciation, where obtainable.

Items of expenses eliminated in arriving at net profit included excessive officers' salaries, bonuses to officers and employees, excessive depreciation charges, losses on sales of capital assets, adjustment of excessive reserves for group insurance on employees, insurance on lives of officers, and other insurance reserves, where found excessive, and also the interest on bonds issued for good will.

In determining the operating income for 1933, estimates were made for the last 4 months in St. Louis, for the last 4 months in Boston, for the last 4 months in Philadelphia, and for the last 2 months in Chicago.

The Chicago schedules, the auditors report, show the net operating profit before deducting income taxes, while the audits on the other three milk sheds represent average net profit on average net plant investment after providing for income taxes.

Salaries of officers in each of the milk sheds were adjusted to comply with the following maximum rates: Presidents, not to exceed $20,000 per annum; vice presidents, not to exceed $15,000 per annum; treasurers, not to exceed $10,000 per annum; and secretaries and comptrollers, not to exceed $5,000 per annum.

In submitting the summaries of the audits the accountant in charge asserted that—

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCFARLANE].

THE DOMESTIC COMMERCE WORK IN THE BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, since the beginning of the new deal there have been established a large number of governmental agencies functioning under an entirely new theory of operation that is contrary to all the known precepts of past departmental trends; this because of the emergency nature of the program at hand. This difference arises from the fact that they were formed with the avowed purpose of redistributing some of the wealth of the Nation by spending huge sums of money. Accompanying this purpose in many cases was also the acknowledged need of quick action by these organizations to relieve the appalling distress of large numbers of the unemployed and needy citizens of this Nation. Operating under such conditions there has perhaps been some waste due to the hurried performance of many of their duties. The administration, realizing these facts, has not been hypercritical in these matters, but, there is not now and never has been, as far as is known, any policy on the part of any administration that will condone the waste of the public moneys by previously organized and supposedly efficient Government agencies in achieving the results desired.

AN INVESTIGATION NEEDED

With this idea in mind, then, it seems that a condition which has been in existence for some time should be made the object of a thorough investigation by the proper authorities. The Domestic Commerce branch of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in the Department of Commerce has been found to be not only a pork barrel into which increasingly large sums have been poured since its beginning with little or no value coming out, but also a hotbed of political intrigue, corruption, and graft.

HISTORY OF DOMESTIC COMMERCE BRANCH

While the history of the Department of Commerce is probably well known it is doubtful whether there is much common knowledge concerning this office. It will be well, therefore, to give a brief outline as to its origin and purposes. After the old Department of Manufactures and Labor was divided into the Department of Commerce and the Department of Labor, there was formed under the Department of Commerce a section known as the "Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce" for the purpose of stimulating, expanding, and promoting American trade both at home and abroad. The foreign part of the work commanded the attention and emphasis at first, but in 1922 a smaller office under this Bureau was created to specialize on domestic commerce with especial reference to the problems of handling and distributing raw materials. The idea back of the formation of this office may or may not be of value today, since thought on this subject has changed in many instances, but at the time it was considered a worthy undertaking, and Congress appropriated $50,000 to cover the expenses of its activities.

This suboffice, known as the "Domestic Commerce Division" was then still further divided into branches known as the "domestic" branch and the "economic research" branch. The Domestic Commerce branch was later divided into three sections, which were recombined during the past year. The present appropriation of these two offices is $266,000, 70 percent of which goes to the domestic branch and the balance of 30 percent going to the economic research branch. Since the beginning of these offices Congress has appropriated to cover the expense of their activities amounts ranging from $50,000 for the year of 1923–24 to $518,220 for the year of 1931–32, and totaling $2,603,160, an average of over $230,000 per year for the 11 years of their existence. Assuming that all appropriations were divided between the two offices in the same proportion as the current year's appropriation, we find that the domestic commerce branch has received a total of $1,822,212. Naturally, one would expect that this office would produce the more valuable information of the two and also more information than the other, but the exact reverse has been the case.

In discussing the results and achievements of this office the trend of the discussion will be from the general to the particular, but it should be borne in mind that documentary evidence and witnesses are at hand and awaiting permission to be introduced to prove the assertions made.

This domestic commerce work has been organized and reorganized many times during its life, and a complete reorganization was attempted in July of last year. The then acting head of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce notified all the employees engaged in domestic commerce work of their dismissal, with the exception of a few employees who were retained since their knowledge of worthy work which could be done was to be used as a basis of a reorganized office. Accordingly a tentative plan was drawn up bringing the activities of the office back within the scope authorized by Congress in creating the work and in appropriations. Every effort was to be made to achieve the results for which Congress had appropriated the sum of $266,000. Many of the functions of this office had departed from the directions of Congress, but in the new set-up this would have been remedied and the new office could have been operated for an amount estimated to be 50 percent of the old. Before this proposed change could be made the temporary head was replaced by the appointment of a permanent director, who took charge of the Bureau but whose appointment is as yet unconfirmed. The new director immediately rescinded all previous orders relating to the change, abolished the idea of any change, and reinstated a number of those who had been dismissed after the beginning of the plan. This means that the old routine of inefficiency and waste is back in this office and likely to stay there for some time unless remedies are devised and enforced.

THE PERSONNEL NEEDS CHANGING

The personnel of this office has been a problem almost from the day of the beginning of this office. Into it have been injected, upon authority of higher executives, numerous incompetents and inefficients. The wasting of Government money at the disposal of these individuals has caused much unfavorable publicity to the Department of Commerce and the Government in general. Ill-advised courses of action as laid down by the heads of this office have caused the domestic commerce work to depart from the routes and ends to be achieved as set out by Congress and has placed the Government in competition with private business men and firms. The misuse of confidential governmental information has caused a great deal of adverse comment, for employees of this outfit have been on the pay rolls of private industries. The lack of discipline in handling this confidential information as set forth by the control by the governmental employees has resulted in the exploitation of the Government integrity, facilities, and data for the benefit of private interests.

In support of the foregoing statements the following specific instances are given and there are, no doubt, many others equally as well known and as easily provable as these.

USELESS EXPENDITURES SHOULD STOP

Numerous employees have been given salaries although they did little or no work, and others who were not qualified to do the work required were continued.

The actions of the employees from this office during the Louisville grocery survey caused an ill reputation to be attached to this agency.

The $2,000 taxi bill of two employees of the office was an obvious waste. A U-Drive-It car was used in a regional survey of the Southeast.

TWO WORTHLESS SURVEYS

The Louisville grocery survey and the St. Louis drug-store survey did very little toward furthering American trade or helping the American taxpayer, yet they were terrifically expensive and are believed to have cost the Government more than $100,000 each, and the only results that the Government can show for these undertakings is the further expense incurred by publishing worthless material in the bulletins covering these surveys. One other result that might perhaps be mentioned is that the Government acquired a great deal of confidential information which was not published but soon became available to certain private interests. Personnel connected with this work took positions with private firms—three employees of the Louisville grocery survey secured high-salaried jobs on the strength of the information thus secured for their former knowledge of the industry was meager.

FAVORITISM SHOWN

One Federal employee has admittedly accepted a fee for consultation on problems akin to those covered in these studies. For this good work he has been retained by the present director after being dismissed by the acting director, and also given a promotion upon reinstatement.

One executive of this office was sick and convalescent for months and yet continued to draw his salary for the full time.

PRIVATE CONCERNS USE CONFIDENTIAL GOVERNMENT INFORMATION

As many as 15 private employees are known to have had excess to the information files and to have used this information. They also used the Government equipment and Government facilities in securing what their (nongovernmental) employers wanted. At one time over 20 people are believed to have worked in or had access to the office where this information was located that were not Government employees.

INEFFICIENCY AND FAVORITISM SHOWN

In closing the discussion on the personnel of the domestic commerce branch office it must be noted that these and other conditions, which were probably just as well known, such as laxness in regard to office hours, performance of duties, indiscriminate traveling, and similar offenses, were winked at and condoned by the heads of this office. These things were called to the attention of the proper officials at various times, but no corrective measures have ever been taken, at least, none that were effective.

In fact, one employee, who was supposedly dismissed from this office for incompetence, was immediately—on the same day—placed in another office which also comes under the same general supervision.

ANALYSIS OF PUBLICATIONS

In a discussion of the literature published by this office, which apparently represents 90 percent or more of the achievements of its employees, the fact must be borne in mind that a majority of the material published had already been issued either in other governmental publications, trade journals, other established sources of information and statistical data, or was common knowledge to the interested public to begin with. In many cases the prior publications of this same office were used as sources for material for reprinting. Acknowledgments of all the sources of the material used would have branded much of the information printed in their bulletins as mere copy. In one instance a whole bulletin was copied from another Government publication. But the authors in this branch of the governmental service are very weak and reticent about acknowledging sources of information.

Accordingly acknowledgments are much more frequently forgotten than put into the new publications, and upon examination one finds that tables, illustrations, maps, and charts have been lifted bodily from their original containers and placed into the new bulletin or pamphlet with such important additions as the withdrawal of pertinent dates, the omission of the most important information, the addition of percentage figures of no value, and the changing of column locations on the page. Important rearrangements and rewritings such as is seen in the changing of the title from "Eggs, butter, and cheese" to "Butter, eggs, and cheese" is an illustration of their technic. As to the amount of such rearrangement, rewriting, copying both accurate and inaccurate, and plagarism, little is known, for no known method would determine the exact amount of this, but we have been able to find a great deal. It is also noteworthy that much of the information contained in the bulletins is presented from 1 month to 3 years later than in the original publication. This is especially true of the information taken from the publications of the Bureau of the Census and the Department of Agriculture and is also true to a large extent of the information taken from the trade journals and periodicals. The practice has been to take from the governmental publications statistical information of all kinds, reworded and rehashed for republication. Tables have been taken from the Census Bureau publications intact, with or without acknowledgments, or rearranged with minor changes and additions.

Needless to say, the republishing of material acquired in this manner is a useless waste of money without regard to the question of the value of the information thus presented to the public. We also find that much of the information secured in this manner is lacking in accuracy due to errors made in copying from the original, which still further detracts from its value. The correction of one such mistake cost the Government $540. The perspective is often lost, and much junk is printed with a great amount of really valuable information left completely out of the text.

A second source of information to the Domestic Commerce employees is through the use of questionnaires. This method accounts for the material presented in those few documents which were believed to be of some value.

A third source of information for the publications of this office was by personal contact of the industry or territory surveyed by the Domestic Commerce branch's experts. This method was used on two of the most expensive undertakings, the Louisville grocery survey and the St. Louis drug-store survey. The resultant publications of these and other similar projects were considered to be absolutely worthless, as the information published consisted only of old business maxims and common knowledge among the personnel of the industries, reissued either in ponderous language or occasionally in just plain, unadorned, and unchanged form.

The domestic commerce branch has issued over 110 bulletins and pamphlets, and besides these a large amount of mimeographed sheets and bound pamphlets of various kinds. Of the 110 or more printed bulletins, 18 are believed to be of value since they contain information that may be worth something to someone or to some business or industry. However, of the 18 considered to be of some value, 12 come under the single title of the "Retail Credit Survey" and its associated publications. Considering, then, that only the first issue of this bulletin necessitated the services of experts and expert planning, since all future issues should have been a matter of routine, we find that the total efforts of the entire domestic commerce branch have resulted in the publication of seven bulletins of probable value during the entire 11 years of the office's existence. Needless to say, these seven bulletins are hardly worth the $1,800,000 or more spent by this office during its life. Of the demand and need for these seven bulletins which are considered valuable, little can be said, for no information could be obtained as to this feature, but it is believed that the material presented could have been obtained in other places by interested individuals, if any, fairly easily.

Of the remaining 98 or more bulletins nothing can be said in the way of praise. They can, however, be classified and divided into two groups based on the opinions of several individuals who are not identified with any special industry or trade, but who tried to render impartial decisions as to the possibility of all of the bulletins containing information of some value to individuals, industries, or businesses. On this basis, then, 29 of the remaining bulletins may have possibly contained information of value to the industry surveyed, and these bulletins were then classified as to value as being possible but doubtful.

Nineteen of the remaining bulletins were found to have been compiled by other governmental agencies and listed under the publications of the domestic commerce branch. This seemed entirely unnecessary, as the material presented could have and should have been published and listed by the office compiling the material contained. Apparently an effort was made to swell the total list of the domestic commerce branch's publications in order to secure the credit of issuing these, and so no decision was rendered on these.

The remaining publications were found to be worthless, containing information of no value. Into this group fall the publications resulting from the Louisville grocery survey and the St. Louis drug-store survey, those two terrifically expensive undertakings which have been previously mentioned.

While speaking generally of the publications of the domestic commerce branch, it seems that a discussion of the eventual disposition of these bulletins, together with the selling price, is in order. There are, however, no accurate sources from which the disposition of these bulletins can be obtained. It is believed, and generally understood, though, that a large number of these publications find their way into the public libraries of the Nation and also into the hands of college and university officials and their students. Considering the worthlessness of the majority of these bulletins, it is extremely surprising that these institutions and people should desire or even care to receive them. A smaller portion has supposedly been sold to individuals seeking information reputedly covered in these pamphlets. But it is very doubtful that any sizeable percentage of these purchasers secured any information or considered that they had received their money's worth no matter how small their expenditure in securing the bulletin. The percentage of actual sales in that group reported sold is very problematical. An examination of the inventory records shows that the stocks on hand are increasing instead of decreasing—in some instances. Also the total number printed cannot be obtained. These increases of stock are believed to be the result of the branch-office closures and the accompanying return of their stock of bulletins. This would indicate that all of the bulletins in the branch offices were placed there on consignment basis and reported sold by the printer at the time of such disposition. Apparently, therefore, the sales reported have been highly inflated and possibly still other methods have been used to inflate these figures.

The disposition of the balance of the number printed is unknown except for the fact that some are provided for free distribution and others turned over to the Superintendent of Documents for sale, where, no doubt, they remain for long periods, accumulating dust and abuse. One other item before leaving the disposition of these valuable bulletins: A cursory examination of the inventory records reveal that 25,000 bulletins are acknowledged to have been destroyed for some reason or other, and one wonders if these figures cover the total destruction. Also, one complete edition of one bulletin was destroyed because of a minor change in wording, which seems entirely unnecessary, and the omission of an acknowledgment. The omission of acknowledgments is altogether too frequent, but the reprinting of an entire edition is a little strange, considering the freeness with which the domestic commerce branch has appropriated material from other publications and neglected to give them credit.

There also seems to be an idea circulating among certain of the executives of this office that some of the information contained in some of these bulletins must be couched in the simplest and most cajoling language or must be delivered very quietly in order not to arouse the animosity or suspicion of the receivers, since the executives of the domestic commerce branch suppose the receivers to be rather ignorant on the subjects relating to their business and wish to educate them without calling their ignorance to their attention.

In order to obtain an idea of the total uselessness of most of the publications of the domestic commerce branch it is necessary to take up a few of these publications individually. In doing this no attempt has been made to pick out specific publications, with two exceptions, which will be taken up first. In selecting passages for quotation from these bulletins no attempt has been made to read each one in its entirety, but from a scattered reading that was done in each bulletin some passage was taken that would indicate, if possible, the whole tone of the bulletin, as far as could be ascertained from such a hurried examination.

Probably the most unique of all the bulletins from the standpoint of its literary value is that bulletin entitled "Aids to Retail Grocery Profits." This is one of the publications resulting from the Louisville survey and was printed and compiled because of the smallness of the sales of the other Louisville grocery survey publications. The reason of the lack of interest in these publications by the grocers and the public, as evidenced by the sales, was assumed to be because of the technical language used in these bulletins. There seemed to be a feeling that the poor, ignorant grocer could not understand the ordinary, everyday trade terms of his business. Accordingly this publication was compiled and printed in words of one or less syllables, if possible, for the avowed purpose of educating the supposedly ignorant grocer to the extent that he would become interested in and purchase the other Louisville publications. This bulletin was commonly referred to as the primer of the Louisville group.

All the information contained in this publication had already been printed in the Louisville group, and therefore this publication was useless unless one assumes the average grocer to be as ignorant as the authors thought he was. It is also useless because it contains no technical information of any value whatsoever.

The cost of compiling this book was estimated at $3,000. The reason for estimating this and other costs of compilation is that there were no records kept that would reveal the accurate cost of compiling each of these bulletins, so the time and expenses of the authors in gathering the material, together with the clerical work that can be fairly assigned to the task, are estimated and this taken as the cost.

The cost of printing this bulletin has been estimated, also, at $1,500. No actual figures on the cost of printing were available either. The reason for setting the cost of printing at $1,500 is that the entire first edition was destroyed because of the desire to make a few minor changes in the wording and the addition of an acknowledgment. Besides the addition of the acknowledgment, a close examination revealed only the following change: Replace "coffee stock" with "investment in coffee."

Seven thousand three hundred and sixty-three of these bulletins—of the second edition—have supposedly been sold at 10 cents each. Assuming these figures to be correct, the net cost to the Government has been $3,763.70.

A few quotations from the bulletin follows:

If it were not for expenses, what a lot of fun running a grocery store would be.

Paragraph 4:

Expenses remind me of a lot of greedy mouths—never filled—always clamoring for more.

Gross margins we might liken to a nice wedge of deep-dish pie—crisp and appetizing—something we would like to keep all for ourselves.

But we cannot. It has to be split into two cuts. One, and usually much the bigger, must first go to feed those hungry expenses.

The above quotations reveal rather clearly the condescension with which this bulletin was written. While it may be possible that some few grocers have never heard of the terms "gross margins" and "expenses", there is undoubtedly a far greater number who have never heard of "deep-dish pie."

The remainder of the Louisville grocery survey publications are seven in number. The cost of gathering the material for these publications has been estimated at $150,000, of which amount that paid by the Government is believed to have exceeded $100,000, the other being borne by the trade association. A majority of the facts presented are almost as old as the grocery business itself, and what little is not has been published in the various trade magazines from time to time. The only original materials set forth are the statistics gathered in the survey, and these are found to be impudent and of no value. The probable net cost to the Government of these seven bulletins is approximately $100,000, since only 17,926 of them have been sold at a price of 10 cents each or less. A few quotations follow:

Bulletin No. 14, page 58, paragraph 2, line 2:

If current liabilities exceed current assets, the concern is headed toward the auctioneer's block; and the most feasible remedial measures are to call upon the owners for a capital contribution, float a long-term loan, or convert an unneeded asset into cash. Sound management demands that current assets be considerably greater than current liabilities.

Bulletin No. 11, page 25, paragraph 4:

An extra man was employed in the store every Saturday. The store hours were from 6 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. A salary of $45 a week was charged against the business for the proprietor, and $10 a week was paid for part-time service of his wife.

The proprietor of the store was well liked. The customers appeared to be his friends and apparently enjoyed shopping there.

The proprietor was his own butcher and handled a very good line of meats. He was especially careful of his fresh fruit and vegetable business and increased it by the installation of modern vegetable racks, which afforded a better display with less spoilage.

The above is a typical pair of quotations taken from these publications. These facts, while they may prove interesting, reveal only details that are in no way essential to the betterment of the trade. No mention is made of reducing current liabilities through more efficient management instead of raising more money through the sources named. These sources may some day run dry. No sensible conclusions can be drawn from the last quotation. In fact, all of the publications are remarkable for their lack of sensible conclusions.

There are six publications as the results of the St. Louis drug-store survey. These publications reputedly set out the problems of the drug stores, and while the statistics presented are original most of the texts smack of a nonsensical rehash of the trade organs. This survey is believed to have cost the Government in the neighborhood of $110,000 for its compilation and about $10,000 for the printing of the results. About $2,500 worth of these publications have been sold so the net cost to the Government is about $117,500. Quotations from two of the bulletins follows. Bulletin 61, paragraph 2, line 8, page 1:

The drug store ranks high in the regard of the people it serves, not because it sells cigars, sodas, and candy, but in spite of that fact.

Paragraph 3, line 5:

It is hoped and believed that the information in this bulletin will enable pharmacists to apply modern business methods to their prescription counters without sacrificing any of the dignity of their profession.

Bulletin No. 73, page 17, line 13:

Shaving creams and dental creams are typically presented in tubes since this offers the most convenient means of transferring the product to a brush. The exception group is depilatory creams, in which there has recently been a decided swing from the jar to the tube, although the usual method of application is with the fingers. The jar is still used to a considerable extent, however, and is the predominant type of container for depilatories in powdered form.

These facts and hopes, while perhaps interesting, have no value in increasing the trade of the retail drug store.

Instead of making quotations from the following-named publications only estimates of their cost to the Government and remarks concerning their true worth will be made.

Bulletin No. 67, Manufacturing Market Statistics, was taken in whole from the material gathered by the Bureau of the Census and other governmental agencies and publications. The material was gathered by the Census in 1930 and was published in this book in 1932, 2 years after its original compilation by the Bureau of Census. The value of this publication is further undermined by the fact that many of the tables of statistics are undated. The cost of compiling this publication is believed to have been about $60,000, and the cost of printing to have been about $15,000, this being due to the fact that the book contains 1,070 pages. It was also this book in which the $540 mistake in copying was made. There have been only 828 of these bulletins sold at the price of $1 each, so the net cost to the Government is approximately $75,000.

Bulletin No. 44, Petroleum Industry of the Gulf Southwest, is estimated to have cost the Government $20,000 in its compilation and $2,500 for its printing; 1,711 of these have been sold or given away, making the net cost of this to the Government approximately $22,500.

The cost of Bulletin No. 52, Hardware Distribution in the Gulf Southwest, is estimated to have cost the Government $15,000 for compilation and $3,424 for printing. About 1,000 of these have been sold at 70 cents each, making the cost to the Government about $17,700.

Before leaving the bulletins and their cost to the Government, it would be well to mention those bulletins prepared for private interests. There are six of these, and they represent probably the best efforts of the Domestic Commerce branch, outranking the other bulletins greatly, both as to statistical detail and completeness. These publications have, apparently, material of real value in them, but they are not Government publications. The employees who prepared these publications were loaned to the special interests, and while the private employers paid their expenses and the expenses of printing and publishing the material gathered, the Government paid their salaries during all the time that they spent on this work. It is believed that these salaries amounted to not less than $50,000.

Judging then all the bulletins from the value of the material found in them, it is believed, that if the wasted efforts directed toward the unnecessary duplication of material already published and the gathering of useless information by the most expensive methods, had been eliminated, that the entire cost of securing and publishing what information of value was found would have been, under efficient management, not more than $25,000. This very plainly shows a lack of planning and judgment on the part of those who are assumed to have been most thoroughly acquainted and best fitted and equipped to understand and solve the problems of commerce and industry. The most striking qualification of the management of this office seems to have been the ability to waste great amounts of money in ludicrous undertakings. A second qualification almost as striking as the first is the facility of gathering information which when placed in the hands of unscrupulous individuals, will enable them to command large sums from special interests and private enterprise. Not only is this detrimental to the operation of the Department of Commerce but also it reflects a great amount of discredit to the Department.

THE REAL-ESTATE SURVEY

It is understood that the Domestic Commerce Branch is at present planning a survey of the real-estate business and will use these plans as a basis of a request for an increased appropriation to carry out this work. Judging then on past performance, the similarity of this proposed survey to the Louisville grocery survey and the St. Louis drug-store survey, seems to indicate very clearly the nature and purpose of the present management. Either it proposes to continue the career of waste and graft, since there have been few changes in the personnel which were the fundamental cause of these conditions, or the present management of this office is unable to see and correct these conditions.

The executives of this office need to have high qualifications in order to carry out the purposes as set forth by Congress. They must be men of unquestioned integrity and with the highest sense of moral values. Not only are qualifications of this kind needed, but also there must be a background of practical experience that will be the guiding factor of this office. The executive responsible for the operation of this office must have a practical knowledge of all business and industrial problems, he must have a keen sense of value and be an accurate judge of human nature. His powers of analysis must be so great that he can readily see all the flaws of plans for future operations spreading over years in time and involving the outlay of tremendous sums of money. His knowledge cannot be confined to one territory but must be of the Nation and the world, and he must be able to comprehend and assimilate all the information coming to him, understanding and accepting the true and recognizing and rejecting the false. If any of these qualifications are missing the routine of this office soon slips back into its old conditions. The present head has definitely reinstated those responsible for these conditions in the past after a complete change had been made. The old regime is apparently back in power to stay unless some strong corrective measures are taken.

These remedial measures seem very plain. Either the entire purpose of the organization must be resurrected and returned to its original status, and all persons and ideas detrimental to this reorganization abolished, or the entire office closed and those few functions that are found to be necessary transferred to other governmental agencies.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HAINES].

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to preface my remarks by inserting several telegrams I received.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The telegrams referred to follow:

DALLASTOWN, PA., January 16, 1934.

Hon. Congressman HARRY L. HAINES,
House of Representatives:

The cigar industry of York County, which depends primarily upon the manufacturing of 2-for-5-cent cigars, must have relief from increase in taxation, wages, and material. Unless something is done our entire district is threatened with ruin caused by unemployment. We are thoroughly in accord with your efforts to establish a $1 revenue for 2-for-5-cent cigars.

PORTO VANA CIGAR CO.

MCSHERRYSTOWN, PA., January 16, 1934.

Hon. Congressman HARRY L. HAINES,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Unless we are relieved from any further taxation on the 2-for-5 cigar it means it will be impossible for us to continue manufacturing this priced cigar, and as our output represents about three forths of the 2-for-5 cigar, you can readily see it will mean the elimination of three fourths of our employees, who are now well satisfied with their present wage scale. You can also well appreciate the fact we must manufacture and sell the class cigar the public demands, which today is principally the 2-for-5 cigar. In behalf of our 370 employees and ourselves we petition you to use your every influence to have it possible for us to continue in business.

Very respectfully,

F. X. SMITH SONS CO.,
Per PETER F. SMITH.

RED LION, PA., January 15, 1934.

Hon. Congressman HARRY L. HAINES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.:

We must have relief from increased taxation on cigars retailing at 2 for 5 cents. The processing tax on tobacco, increased wages, and advanced price of materials will prohibit the manufacturing of 2-for-5-cent cigars. Our industry will be ruined, and we alone will throw 350 people out of work. While the revenue is graduated on cigars retailing at 5 cents and up, it is not fair to us to pay the same rate on 2-for-5-cent cigars as on 5-cent cigars. One dollar per thousand would make it possible to continue manufacturing 2-for-5-cent cigars and keep our people employed. The amount of revenue the Government would lose through reducing the rate would certainly be made up through increased production of 2-for-5-cent cigars; and should we be compelled to discontinue manufacturing 2-for-5-cent cigars the loss in revenue would be much greater.

W. J. NEFF & CO.,
Cigar Manufacturers.

EAST PROSPECT, PA., January 16, 1934.

Hon. Congressman HARRY L. HAINES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.:

The cigar industry of York County, which is practically a 2-for-5 manufacturing district, has suffered tremendously due to increased labor cost under the N.R.A. and the processing tax, We are now confronted with increased cost on cigar boxes in advance of the price of some types of tobacco and other material. If this district hopes to continue the manufacturing of cigars and the employing of thousands of cigarmakers, we must have relief from increased taxation, since there are different classifications of revenue stamps, the higher-priced cigar paying the higher revenue per thousand cigars. It would be only fair that the 2-for-5-cent cigar should have a lower tax than the 5-cent cigar. We feel that a revenue of $1 per thousand on the 2-for-5-cent cigar would not only be just but also helpful to a dying industry. As a manufacturer of 2-for-5-cent cigars, we will appreciate your cooperation in this noble cause.

EAST PROSPECT CIGAR CO.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, I have sought these few minutes to present to the House a subject in which I am personally interested and because of its importance to 15,000 men and women employed in my congressional district in the industry of manufacturing cigars.

About one eighth of all the cheap cigars produced in the United States are manufactured in my congressional district. Almost 300 independent cigar-manufacturing plants are located in this district. The men and women there have been cigarmakers for generations, and their grandparents before them. Practically 100 percent of these people are native white American citizens, many of them known as "Pennsylvania Germans", although all are not confined to that race. But be that as it may, they make up a fine body of American citizenship engaged in the production of cigars.

This afternoon let me call the attention of the committee to the fact that we have had an almost complete breakdown of the cigar industry in my district, and we must come to Congress for some relief.

The cigar manufacturers I represent do not use machines in the manufacture of their product but their cigars are made by hand. Were they to install machines, although it would be of great economic value to them, it would completely deprive thousands of men and women of employment in the cigar trade. The bankers and business men of my district, including these manufacturers, see the wisdom of continuing to employ hand labor in this industry. As I say, the installation of machinery in this industry would mean throwing, perhaps, 70 percent of the people of my district out of employment; and there are about 15,000 of them in this business.

This automatic cigar-making machine has displaced so many cigarmakers in the industry already that we simply dare not have these machines installed if we are to keep our men and women employed. Our manufacturers are hardly able to compete, and, of course, it means that no small manufacturer could hope to remain in business if the machines were to dominate completely the field and have the hand workers dismissed.

In 1907 we produced more than seven billions of cigars in the United States, and now in the year 1934 we are producing a little more than one half that quantity. In 1907 we had about 25,000 cigar manufacturers in the United States, and today we have a little more than 5,000. I contend that the permanency of this great Republic is dependent upon the ability of the small manufacturer to operate and build for himself a business, for in the days of the past many of these great cigar-producing concerns started with just a few cigarmakers. I pity the small manufacturer who attempts to compete with the group today, with their machine-made cigars, their printer's ink, and radio advertising, much of which is an insult to the intelligence of our people. My people produce fine-quality cigars for the money, and they retail at from 2 for 5 cents to higher prices, but the greater portion of cigars made in my district are the 2-for-5-cent grade. There is a potential market for our manufacturers to keep all our people employed, but unfortunately Congress has seen fit to have a process tax on tobacco that has made it almost impossible to continue to produce these cigars, and as a result there are thousands of my people unemployed and considerably disturbed as to their own future. The people I represent make some 5-cent cigars and few higher-priced cigars; but, as stated before, the greater percentage are the cigars retailing at 2 for 5 cents.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAINES. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Does the gentleman think it would be a good plan to just burn this surplus stock?

Mr. HAINES. I do not.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Neither do I, but that has been followed in the case of some other products.

Mr. HAINES. As a result the cigars from the Philippine Islands are selling and displacing the cigars made by my people and the people in other States of the Union. Ohio and Florida are large producers of these cheap cigars, and also New Jersey and other States all have manufacturers making these cigars.

Practically all the manufacturers in my district patriotically signed the President's Reemployment Agreement, but unfortunately about 40 percent of the manufacturers of the Nation did not. My people, especially those who did sign the P.R.A., are paying a wage scale far in excess of those who did not sign the P.R.A. and are now being penalized because of their patriotism, in the loss of their customers and the business they spent years in building up, for every one of us is asked why he cannot sell his cigars as low as the other fellow who did not sign the P.R.A. The situation is alarming to my people, and for this reason we are anxious to have the code, as it relates to wages and hours of employment, approved and put into immediate effect. The N.R.A. is not so popular with the cigarmakers because it has failed to give them the code they are so anxious to have, and yet I want to say to you that it has helped them more than they realize, so far as their rate of pay is concerned, in that it has increased their rate of pay as much as 50 percent in some instances, but it has also left them without work, and many of them would be willing to work for the former low rates rather than be unemployed. Personally, I know the N.R.A. has helped them a lot, for the rates of pay given to many of our cigarmakers were a disgrace and a shame upon our intelligence and the day in which we live. Manufacturers in striving for business to keep their people employed were led into these low rates of pay until they themselves have seen their great mistake and are now anxious to have a code that will give to labor decent pay and also bring all the manufacturers of cigars in the Nation into a code that will not give an unfair advantage to those who want to exploit human hands. We must do something for the farmer if he is to continue to grow the cigar-leaf types of tobacco. In 1933 Pennsylvania farmers produced almost 35,000,000 pounds of tobacco. A normal crop is about 40,000,000 pounds, but about 12,000,000 pounds was destroyed and about 8,000,000 pounds is still in the hands of the farmers of the 1932 crop unsold, and will likely remain unsold, spoil on his hands, unless something is done to increase cigar consumption.

Ohio grows about 20,000,000 of pounds; 4,000,000 was destroyed of last year's crop, with about 7,000,000 of the 1932 crop unsold, with the prospects not bright at all for the 1933 sale.

In Wisconsin the farmers have a pool, and are holding, I am told, about 22,000,000 pounds; and it is estimated that one half of the 1932 crop remains on their hands unsold. Connecticut grows a fine wrapper and binder type of tobacco that has been taken care of by the R.F.C., but I know instances where 35-cent tobacco sold at as low as 3 cents, because of the great surplus of tobacco on hand. Much of this tobacco is exported because of the texture of the leaf which is suited for wrapper and binder purposes. They also grow in the shade a great deal of fine wrapper tobacco; and if our nationally advertised brands of cigars would have more of the Connecticut wrappers used on their product, instead of the imported wrappers they make so much fuss about, the farmers of Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Florida would profit quite a bit.

The machines are made to use the imported tobacco wrappers at the expense of the American farmers. The State of Florida also produces a fine type of wrapper tobacco, and if they would receive more encouragement at the hands of the large corporations which use automatic machines—and there are probably no more than 25 out of the 5,000 or more who do use machines—the Florida farmers could produce a better crop; and, instead of producing it at a loss, they would show a profit to those farmers. Georgia grows tobacco similar to that of Florida, and there is also a fine type of wrapper that is suited for cigars grown in parts of Alabama. New York State grows a fine binder type, and parts of Massachusetts produce a tobacco very similar to that grown in Connecticut. These farmers need a greater consumption of tobacco if they are to continue growing the weed.

I want you to know, my colleagues, that in every crop that grows there is about a 30-percent lower grade that is unsuited for the finer types of cigars, such as the ground leaves, the top leaves, some broken tobaccos, very often hail-cut or storm-damaged crops, so this cheaper grade of cigar is of great importance to the farmer. In addition to this, the cheap cigar contains all domestic-grown tobacco, and in many of these cigars you will find some of the finer quality of tobacco. Right now these 2-for-5's offer unusual quality because of the low price at which tobacco could be purchased.

I have introduced a bill in this Congress known as "H.R. 7398", seeking to have a lower rate of tax on cigars retailing up to and including 3 cents each. At the present time we pay a revenue of $2 on cigars retailing up to and at 5 cents; we pay $3 per thousand for cigars retailed at from 5 to 8 cents, inclusive, and a rate of tax of $5 per thousand for cigars made to retail from 7 to 15 cents, and so on.

It seems to me only fair that cigars retailing at half the 5-cent price should bear one half the tax. When I took this matter up with the Department of Agriculture tobacco division, headed by Mr. Hutson, he told me he was in sympathy with my efforts and believed that it would be very helpful to the cigar situation. I tell you frankly—and I speak with some knowledge of this industry after having had more than a quarter of a century of experience in the business—that unless we give some relief to the manufacturers of cheap cigars, we are going to further decrease cigar consumption and thus create a greater problem as to the price the farmer can obtain for his tobacco. While this $1 per thousand lower tax rate on these cheap cigars will mean a loss of several millions of dollars in receipts to the Treasury, I am confident that within a year or two an increased cigar sale will make up this loss, and I know it is going to mean much to move the tobacco in the hands of our farmers and packers.

I can say to each one of you that the manufacturers will not want to use this $1 per thousand cigars for their own profit, but, on the other hand, they can purchase the tobacco at a higher cost and also pay labor more money; indeed, I have no hesitancy in saying to you that I believe that most of this $1 per thousand will go to labor.

The N.R.A. code will ask a higher rate of pay than some cigar manufacturers now pay to labor, and then, without this relief, these cheap cigars will disappear from the market. I am sure you will all agree that these small independent manufacturers cannot hope to compete successfully with the highly advertised brands of 5-cent cigars, and to enter that highly competitive field is almost out of the question. I am standing here today in an appeal that I be given the support of this House in granting this new tax for the lower-grade cigars, knowing that if granted it will contribute just that much toward keeping men and women employed. I have asked the Internal Revenue Bureau to agree to this proposal of mine, and am quite encouraged by their attitude, for I am sure they, too, appreciate the plight of the small independent manufacturer of the cheaper grades of cigars. May I remark in conclusion that I first thought of trying to have the processing tax eliminated from these cheap cigars, but I appreciate how difficult this would be from an administrative standpoint. The processing tax is about $1 per thousand cigars, and with its coming and the increased cost under N.R.A. the industry could no longer produce the 2-for-5-cent, or 3-cent, cigars.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAINES. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. If I understand the gentleman's argument, it is that on account of the processing tax the manufacturer of these cheap cigars is compelled to go out of business?

Mr. HAINES. That and the increased cost under the N.R.A. code.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I have in mind.

Mr. HAINES. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. The paper mills in my section of New York State are practically going to be put out of business on account of the processing tax on cotton, because paper bags come in competition with cotton sacks. Has the gentleman any suggestion to make whereby I can get some relief?

Mr. HAINES. I may say to the distinguished leader from New York that I have troubles of my own in this connection and I am going to solve my own problems as best I can.

Mr. SNELL. I will trade the gentleman some paper sacks for cigars.

Mr. HAINES. I think the gentleman and I could probably strike a bargain.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. How about some bluegrass seed?

Mr. HAINES. I have spoken to many Members of Congress on this subject and you have been most sympathetic and I hope to have your continued interest in the hope that an industry like ours, that of the hand-made-cigar industry, be continued to give employment to thousands of our citizens. I should like to invite you to visit these cigar-producing communities. You will find beautiful small towns, with modern sanitary factories; beautiful homes, well kept; and a thrifty, frugal people that is typical of the finest of our citizenship. It was suggested to me that I insert in my bill that this $1 tax apply only to hand-made cigars. I want to say here that I think the automatic cigar machine has done much harm to the cigar industry, in that it cannot produce as fine-quality cigars as the human hand produces, and has thrown thousands of men and women out of jobs, but it is not my purpose to want to build a business at the expense of tearing down another, but at the same time I know that it is not the machine that needs this help, for they have already driven hand-made prices so low that it is the chief reason for the low wages that were paid in the past; but, with some encouragement of this House in approving my bill, I feel sure it will be a step in the right direction and will win for you the gratitude of a fine group of your fellow Americans.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOZIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 7513, the State and Justice Departments, the judiciary, Commerce and Labor Departments appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced a joint resolution carrying an appropriation of $950,000,000 for the C.W.A. and relief. I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the reading of the Journal on Friday next it may be in order to take up this bill for final passage and that all points of order thereto be considered as waived.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PRINTING HOUSE DOCUMENT WITH REVISED LIST OF RETIRED EMERGENCY OFFICERS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in the Seventy-first Congress, third session, in 1931, the House granted me permission to have printed as House Document 802 a complete list of the emergency officers who had been retired on pay. sanitary factories; beautiful homes, well kept; and a thrifty, Since then I am informed that about 4,800 out of the sixty-three-hundred-and-odd officers have been dropped from the rolls, leaving about 1,518. My colleague from Texas tells me that this revised list, if printed, would be very valuable to us all and to every American Legion post in the United States. The list would be very much smaller than the original House Document 802. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document the revised and corrected list up to date. I have spoken to both the majority leader and the minority leader about it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Texas whether the list will include all reserve officers or just those remaining on the list?

Mr. BLANTON. It will not show the ones who have been stricken off the list. It will be a revised list of all the remaining officers now on such list.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the list will show the names and addresses of the various officers by States?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; all of the information about them that was in no. 802. In some cases the amount has been reduced, and the new House document will give the amount they are now drawing.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs I ask permission of the House for that committee to sit during sessions of the House for the remainder of this week and all of next week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

THE GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY—PETITIONS

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the people of Michigan are by no means a unit on the question of the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty. In fairness to those individual citizens who are opposed to it in my State I desire to make this statement for the RECORD:

I received petitions today signed by 108,000 citizens of Michigan. These petitions were collected under the auspices of the Michigan Railroad Employees and Citizens' League. The petitions are addressed to my colleague the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] and myself, and are in our possession. It is my view that the petitions are based upon a misconception of the seaway facts, and I shall discuss that matter later in the Senate, but without any prejudice to the petitions, and with this statement respecting the good faith of the signers, I state again that I have received individual petitions signed by 108,000 citizens of Michigan, and I ask that the form of the petition be printed in the RECORD so that the Senate may know in fairness this Michigan viewpoint different from that which I earnestly entertain.

There being no objection, the form of the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MICHIGAN RAILROAD EMPLOYEES AND CITIZENS LEAGUE, LANSING, MICH.

A PETITION

To the Honorable JAMES COUZENS and the Honorable ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,

Members from Michigan of the Senate of the United States:

As a resident of Michigan I hereby petition yourselves and the honorable Senate of the United States not to ratify the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty for these reasons:

The waterway is not needed. We have currently a Lakes-to-the-sea waterway and other wholly efficient transportation facilities. We cannot afford it. The woeful condition of public finances and our already grievous tax burden warrant no such vast expenditure. It will divert traffic from the adequately equipped railroads, thereby increasing their insolvency and otherwise destroying the vested rights of American citizens. It will not benefit the wheat grower or furnish farm relief. American labor will be one of the most serious losers from it. It will not cure the depression nor is it desirable as unemployment relief. American ports will suffer. It is not necessary to our foreign trade. Our local markets will be at the mercy of cheaply produced foreign goods. Lastly, we must furnish the bulk of the money for a project (1) benefiting another nation more than our own and (2) lying more largely in foreign territory than in our own—doubly a source of more unwanted foreign debts and of delicate international situations.

Voluntarily I the undersigned, therefore, submit this my protest and earnestly urge that you vote against such ratification.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if I believed the basic facts to be as set out in this text, I should entirely concur in the conclusions reached by these petitioners. In other words, I think their attitude is logical on the premise submitted to them for signature. The trouble is that I must dissent from the premise. In every particular I disagree with the allegations of fact. Before the debate concludes I shall undertake to support this disagreement with a bill of particulars. Since I hold to this contrary view respecting the facts, it is natural that I come to a different conclusion. Therefore, I find myself in the painful necessity of disagreeing with this large group of my constituents. If the treaty is not ratified and the seaway project dies, none of us will ever know the right and the wrong of the matter. But if the treaty survives and the seaway starts to operate in 1942 or thereabouts, I know that all of these constituents will join me in the hope that their fears may prove groundless and that my confident expectations may be wholly realized.

I believe the seaway will be an incalculable boon to the Commonwealth which I have the honor in part to represent. I believe it will stimulate our industry and agriculture and provide more rather than less jobs for all our labor, including our railroad labor. I believe it is Michigan's greatest single opportunity for the future. If I were to write a petition in such language and ask for widespread signatures, they would be forthcoming in eloquent degree. In other words, the final importance of the signature depends upon the premise to which it is attached, and it is the premise upon which these constituents and myself are in disagreement.

No man can be justified in taking a dogmatic attitude in respect to such a matter. No one can say who is right and who is wrong with conclusive assurance. Each citizen and each Senator can only follow his own conscientious convictions. I repeat that I shall hope to discuss the text of these petitions in detail before the debate concludes. In the meantime I present the petitions, and I commend the industry with which this Michigan League has pursued its quick and highly organized campaign to such a spectacular conclusion. It is impossible for me to reply individually to each petitioner. I trust this acknowledgment may be considered as addressed to all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF FISH AND FISHING GEAR

As in legislative session,

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, day before yesterday a formal resolution in respect to tuna fish was adopted asking information of the Tariff Commission. I have been asked to amplify the resolution so that it may refer to other matters in related subjects. I therefore submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 165), as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Tariff Commission be, and hereby is, requested, in addition to the investigations requested by Senate Resolution 159, agreed to by the Senate January 30, 1934, to investigate the importation into the United States not only of fresh and frozen tuna fish, but also salmon and other fish, and also nets and netting and other gear employed by fishermen and fisheries imported into the United States, and the effect of such importations on their production in the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may I ask the Senator from California whether the suggested investigation is under the Tariff Commission's general powers or under the flexible tariff provisions of the law?

Mr. JOHNSON. I rather think it is under the general powers of the Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California? Without objection, the resolution is agreed to.

TREATY-MAKING POWERS OF THE SENATE—ADDRESS BY SENATOR THOMAS, OF UTAH

Mr. BACHMAN. Mr. President, I present an address delivered by Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS, of Utah, at the annual meeting of the American Political Science Association, held in Philadelphia on December 27, 1933, which I ask may be published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be published in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

If I were not talking to a learned group I would be backward in placing before you the very simple approach which I have to offer. Politically, my feelings and my attitude have been such that I can agree heartily in all that Professor Fleming has said, and I appreciate the constructive suggestions of Professor Dangerfield, but constitutionally I do not agree. To do away with the two-thirds rule or to set up an advisory council on foreign affairs and relations—both seem to me politically inexpedient and neither gives promise of ever becoming accomplished. I still see merit in the "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate * * * provided two thirds of the Senators present concur." I repeat, I say, that in spite of the fact that I have been disappointed over lost causes.

The Senate is definitely a creature of men who wanted a government by the people, but who, nevertheless, were afraid of democracy.

You are all familiar with Washington's answer to Jefferson when Jefferson asked Washington how it happened that they created such a thing as the United States Senate. Jefferson had just poured his tea out into a saucer. Washington answered Jefferson's question by asking Jefferson why he poured the tea into the saucer before he drank it, and Jefferson replied, "To cool it, of course." Washington said the Senate of the United States was brought into existence to create a cooling process.

The Senate was not only meant to aid in the check-and-balance scheme but it was also created as a continuing legislative institution with some executive functions. Being the result of one of the compromises in the Constitution, it must be considered one of the accidents.

The Senate's growth and development to power, I am sure, are contrary to the anticipation of the fathers. While to call it the greatest deliberative body in the world is merely to use words which, to me at least, are meaningless, yet the Senate is nevertheless something like that. I know of no other place under our constitutional scheme where opposition to a governmental policy can get a hearing so quickly, and that hearing be carried to the people, as in the Senate of the United States. In a democracy, opposition is essential, and the recognition of the Senate as a great deliberative body has partially come as a result of the two-thirds rule.

We lose sight of the fact that governments, regardless of their form, are always personal, and all connected with governments are merely men and women. In our constitutional scheme much that we do today is a result of the personality and the attitudes of our officials as the basic constitutional principles themselves.

Washington's reaction to the Senate when he sought its advice in regard to Indian treaties was typically Washington's. Another man, dealing with the Senate in the same way, may have given us quite a different precedent. Hay's and Theodore Roosevelt's feelings about the Senate, and their reactions to senatorial action, reflect the men. In spite of Hay's words about the Senate's treating everything which the President refers to it as a bull is treated in the arena, with his further statement that while no one could predict the time of the bull's fall, it was sure to be killed, is hardly, historically speaking, a proper conclusion. And to mention Hay again, it is conceivable, at least to me, that the Senate may at some day or other accept an important treaty.

I am just wondering if President Wilson's reactions to the Senate in his late years were not a result of a conclusion he came to years before, when he wrote in his "Constitutional Government" that whenever the President shall "rightly interpret the national thought and boldly insist upon it, he is irresistable." President Wilson wrote that. He believed it, and as a result he thought the people would sustain him.

It is true that the two-thirds rule in regard to the ratification of treaties permits the Senate to play politics. It allows many factors which have not to do with the real business at hand to enter in. That, of course, is a weakness, but it is the type of weakness that enters into practically every phase of government. There are solutions that might be suggested to overcome this situation if we want to overcome it. No one, of course, can predict in a contest between the Executive and the Senate which side is going to be considered right by the next generation. There are few absolute rights and wrongs in politics. We may amend the Constitution. We may let the whole of Congress legislate a policy which may have the force of a treaty; but when you consider that a treaty becomes the law of the land, and may even supplement or even supplant other law, probably the two-thirds requirement is not out of place.

But my suggestive solution is, as I said in the beginning, very simple. I would turn time back. I see no reason for assuming that the prepositions "by" and "with" and the words "advice" and "consent" and the concurring provision should all be considered as a single act, and have no relative time sequence. I have been told by some constitutional teacher at some time that every word in the Constitution is important. If that is the case, there must have been some reason for using the two prepositions "by" and "with" instead of just one. I do not see why, in other words, we should not assume that the act of getting advice should come before the act of obtaining consent.

In the matter of appointments, so far as the official act of the Senate is concerned, the advice and the consent are given at the same time. But I think it is common knowledge that the President of the United States nominates many people on the advice of individual Senators. I know now that you are going to say that I am merely suggesting that the Executive follow the scheme of making a Member of the Senate a party to the negotiation. To use a concrete example, to follow President Harding at the time of the Washington Conference. But that is not my idea; neither is it my idea that the Senate should in any sense become a privy council. But I see no reason at all why the Executive should not embrace all of the facilities which are at his command for bringing about his program. It may be of interest to you who have not followed Senate organization in all its details to call your attention to the fact that there are 23 Senators on the Committee on Foreign Relations. Of these 23 Members, 14 ordinarily belong to the party in power. It may also be interesting to call your attention to the fact that this committee generally contains the leaders of other very important committees. A proposition given the united support of the Executive and a committee of 23 Senators could hardly fail. Of course, if you figure it out by arithmetic, it can fail. Even if the Executive could not control any of the opposition members of the Foreign Relations Committee, he would still have the support of 14 members of his own party. Secret executive sessions of the Senate are things of the past. Committee sessions behind closed doors are still with us. Cannot the Executive use this committee as an advisory group in relation to treaties, since he has to receive from it its consent before the treaty can be ratified? The idea, I am sure, is not new. It is, though, a way out, and a way, too, which will contribute to our governmental processes.

I have been told that our Government is a government of checks and balances. I believe that liberty can be maintained quite as readily by a balance through cooperation as through a check by opposition. Surely the day must pass when it is easier for the Executive to get agreement with a foreign power than with a committee of his own Senate.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada for the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway, signed July 18, 1932.

[Mr. DIETERICH resumed and concluded the speech begun by him on yesterday. His speech entire is as follows:]

Wednesday, January 31, 1934

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, in what I have to say concerning the ratification of this treaty I think I can approach the subject conscious of every obligation and duty that rests upon me as a United States Senator, and I hope the Senate will take the views I shall present with the same sincerity with which they are presented.

A lack of experience would dictate that I should not try to approach this subject in any manner except one of fairness and justice. I do represent in part a sovereign State whose citizens are intensely interested in this treaty by reason of the fact that they feel that if the treaty is ratified in its present form, an irreparable injury will be inflicted upon that State and its citizens.

I approach this discussion conscious of the fact that it is my duty to yield where sectional interests conflict with the public good; that in that event it is my duty, whatever I might suffer in popularity locally, to surrender those sectional interests for the public good. I also feel that, if a great good is to be accomplished, it is the duty of the Senate to try to accomplish that good without inflicting an injury; and without expressing any opinion as to the project which is the main object in this treaty—that is, the construction and the canalization of the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River so that a greater degree of commerce can pass over that particular traffic lane—I think that can be accomplished without injury to any sovereign State, or any interest in any sovereign State.

So I believe that I can approach this discussion, as the President of the United States well expressed the matter in his message transmitting this treaty to the Congress, on broad national grounds.

I believe that my fears as to what the effect of this treaty will be upon the interests of my State are not imaginary fears. They are not fears that have been conjured up by imaginary wrongs. They are fears based upon a conscientious belief that if the treaty is ratified in its present form an injustice will be done not only to the citizens of my State but to the citizenship and their property interests in a great portion of the central part of the Union.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. DIETERICH. I do.

Mr. LONG. If we decide to take several hundred million dollars and invest them in Canada, and give them a half ownership in Lake Michigan, has the Senator considered the question whether it would not be a good thing for States like Illinois and Louisiana to give Canada a half ownership of their States, so that we could come in on this money?

Mr. DIETERICH. Of course, I have not directed my inquiry along that line, and I am unable to answer the Senator's question. My inquiry has not been on visionary matters. It has been upon the substantial things that are presented by the treaty. I am going to try to divorce myself, as far as is humanly possible, from any prejudice that I might have gathered by reason of residence or by reason of research. With due respect to those who have opposed this treaty, I want to say that I am very fearful that they are so saturated with a prejudice that they fail to see any virtue or any justice in anyone who dares to think differently than they do.

I am opposed to this treaty because it gives away substantial sovereign rights that are a great deal more important to the citizenship of this country than the matter of improving some method of transportation; and in my opposition I do not want it said of me that I am surrendering one bit of loyalty to the President of the United States. I have loyally supported his entire program. I have no regrets and no apologies to offer. I expect to support the remainder of his program. I am not using the President in this particular interest because at this particular time he happened to give an expression that is favorable to something with which I am in sympathy.

I think the President of the United States has been misled. I think those who have given him advice upon the question of the treaty and the effect of the treaty and its various provisions have misled the Executive into believing that those things that might be harmful will not be harmful, and exaggerating, possibly, the good that might be derived from the treaty.

I do not say that that was done wrongfully, but it was done by reason of the fact that his advisers have dwelt on this proposition so long they are blind to their own prejudices. Prejudice is a peculiar thing. We have it, and we do not ourselves know it. It is a part of us. We measure that prejudice as something normal and everything that runs counter to it as abnormal, when the fact of the matter is that when we are once saturated with that prejudice you might as well attempt to wash the dirt out of a cloud as the prejudice out of a man's mind.

It is rather difficult to pick up from this maze of data and from the bewildering arguments the real things that should control the actions of the Senate in determining whether or not they shall ratify the treaty. The record is a bewildering maze of data. Every expression, every opinion for or against any provision of the treaty, has found its way into the record. Engineering figures, scientific opinions as to the effect, as to the costs, all have found their way into the record, until it is rather confusing, and that confusion sometimes obscures the real thing that should be taken into consideration by the Senate in determining whether or not they will ratify the treaty.

I am conscious of my duty to the particular political group which I represent. Perhaps my idea of a party platform is a little different from that of others; is a little different from that of some legislators. I regard my party platform as a sacred contract between myself and the electorate, which they have a right to expect that I will respect and carry out. It is the only method that the citizen has of translating his will into law and policies of government. So it is perfectly proper to search the platforms of the different political parties whose representatives now have seats in the Congress, to determine whether or not any obligation is raised from that particular source.

I will confess, Mr. President, that possibly I had not read my platform as closely as I should have done. Sometimes we take many things for granted. If someone should have asked me day before yesterday whether or not the question of the St. Lawrence waterway, together with the other waterways, was in my party platform, I would have answered "yes", and the reason I would have answered "yes" was because evidently at the time the committee on resolutions was ready to report, the advance publicists got out a little publication from an irresponsible source, publishing in parallel columns the two different platforms, and in that publication was the declaration that we were for waterways, including the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes seaway. The explanation of why it is not in the authentic platform is perfectly clear—that the convention refused to commit itself to the St. Lawrence waterway—and refused specifically to do that. That is the deduction I draw.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. A part of that history is obscure, I admit; but there is no obscurity as to the fact that the platform committee did not act on any such resolution whatever, nor was it ever presented to the convention.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, all I can do is to draw my deductions from what I have before me.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nevada a question? I understood the Senator from Nevada to say that there is no question that the platform committee and the convention did not act upon that question.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. LONG. That is all right. That is what we want the Senator to say.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is right.

Mr. DIETERICH. However, that is not important, Mr. President. It matters not whether that language was in the platform or not. If we declared ourselves for waterways, we had a right to take into consideration that it meant the waterways that would be beneficial to our country. We had a right to take into consideration that it meant all of the waterways; and I am not making any point on that particular matter.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois further yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think the Senator from Illinois was here this morning when the same platform question came up, and I stated exactly what the Senator has said—that from the beginning of our Government we have had treaties with regard to the use and development of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence.

Mr. DIETERICH. I thank the Senator; but I do not want to approach this question upon a technical ground. I do not think this is a place where we should try to outsmart each other. I think we should approach the question upon the grounds that we conscientiously feel from our investigations are correct grounds. As I said, if those investigations lead us to the place where we feel that the particular constituency which we represent should suffer an injury to accomplish a public good, it is our duty to vote for the public good; but it is further our duty to try to accomplish that public good without injuring any citizen, either in his person or in his property or in his happiness.

When the platforms of the two political parties were adopted in Chicago, the St. Lawrence Treaty was not in existence. There could have been no reference to this particular treaty. When those platforms were adopted in the city of Chicago, the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1930 was the law of the land, and it was binding upon the parties in those conventions and binding upon the citizenship; and it is reasonable to believe that when the two platforms were adopted, and when the Democratic platform declared for waterways generally, they had in mind this—the Illinois—particular waterway.

The Rivers and Harbors Act of July 3, 1930, provides—and I quote from it now—

> That as soon as practicable after the Illinois waterway shall have been completed in accordance with this act, the Secretary of War shall cause a study of the amount of water that will be required as an annual average flow to meet the needs of a commercially useful waterway as defined in said Senate document, and shall, on or before January 31, 1938, report to the Congress the results of such study with his recommendations as to the minimum amount of such flow that will be required annually to meet the needs of such waterway and that will not substantially injure the existing navigation on the Great Lakes to the end that Congress may take such action as it may deem advisable.

I say that was a part of the law of the land when the two conventions met and when the two platforms were adopted, and every citizen has a right to construe and interpret every provision and every expression in that platform in accordance with and in view of existing law and existing projects.

Further, the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1930 became a part of the Democratic platform by implication, because, when the reference was made to existing waterways—impliedly the Rivers and Harbors Act, which appropriated some $7,000,000 to complete the Illinois waterway project, and which provided that after the waterway had been completed a study of at least 5 years should be made to determine what quantity of water was necessary in order to meet the needs of navigation—it was a part of the party pledge, as it was a part of the law.

A serious question arises as to whether or not the treaty-making power has the right to repeal this law by a treaty; and that is what we are attempting to do at the present time. We are attempting to do it by a treaty which takes into consideration the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in a case where the question of the sufficiency of water for navigation purposes on the Illinois River and on the Lakes-to-the-Gulf canal was not in question and arbitrarily repeals the River and Harbor Act of 1930.

Furthermore, that waterway was not completed until 1933; and before that waterway was completed, and before any study could have been made as to the quantity of water that was necessary to supply the needs of navigation, the treaty was signed and submitted to Congress. I say that that treaty was signed and submitted to Congress in violation of the laws of this land, passed by the Congress.

Mr. PITTMAN rose.

Mr. DIETERICH. Does the Senator wish to ask me a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I desire to know if the Senator has seen the report of the Board of Engineers in response to the paragraph of the Rivers and Harbors Act which he read.

Mr. DIETERICH. I have seen that report; and if the Senator from Nevada will be patient, I will read from it before I conclude my remarks.

Mr. PITTMAN. Very well. I shall not interrupt the Senator to read it, then.

Mr. DIETERICH. The query now arises in my mind: Was the President advised by those who were so anxious to have the treaty brought to the Senate and ratified as to the rights of the States that have been looking forward for over a century to the establishment of a waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf? Was he advised that their rights were being violated and that the waterway that had been the concern of Congress for more than a century was being strangled?

I do not think it is fair, in view of the record as it stands, to imply that someone is guilty of sectionalism, that someone has fallen below the standard that we have a right to expect of a Senator because he presents these matters to the Senate.

For a long while efforts had been made to construct a Lake-to-the-Gulf waterway. This development grew by regular steps and by regular improvements. It was not started as a sectional project, because when it was started there was no Chicago; there was no sanitary district.

This waterway was advocated by citizens of the eastern part of the United States for the reason that they wanted to develop those sections and those settlements that were building up on the Great Lakes and they wanted to give them an outlet to the sea. They had been unable to negotiate with Great Britain to obtain the use of the Niagara River.

I want now briefly to give a history of the development of the Lakes to the Gulf waterway project. I shall read from a brief which has been filed in this record, but which, perhaps, has not been brought to the attention of all the Senators. What I am stating here is not the result of my own research but is taken from a brief which was filed by an association known as the "Mississippi River Valley Association", comprising representatives of all the States that border on the Mississippi River and its tributaries. I think I can say that is so with very few exceptions.

Such a project became the concern of the United States Government early in the history of the country. In 1808 Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury, urged upon the Senate that a canal between Lake Michigan and the Illinois River be built (American State Papers, vol. 1). In 1810 Congress adopted a resolution, offered by Peter B. Porter, Congressman from New York, having the same purpose in view (Brown's History, p. 126). It was included in a bill in Congress in 1811, along with the Erie and other canals, and it was recommended in 1814 by President Madison. So this waterway is not a recent project, and it is not one related to the sanitary district of Chicago.

In 1816, in a treaty between the Pottawatamie Indians and the United States, the Indians ceded to the United States a strip of land 20 miles wide from Lake Michigan to the mouth of the Fox River on the Illinois River for a small sum, upon a promise that a canal would be built connecting these two water systems (Brown's History, p. 138). In 1817 Congress adopted a resolution, offered by John Holmes, of Massachusetts, requiring an investigation of the expediency of this canal (Brown's History, p. 139).

The practicability of this route was covered by a report of Maj. Stephen H. Long, of the United States Army, in 1817, transmitted by John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, to Henry Clay, Speaker of the House of Representatives, in 1819 (Ex. Doc. 17, of 16th Cong., 1st sess.). Graham and Phillips recommended the route in a report in 1819, and in 1821 Congress adopted a resolution directing the Committee on Public Lands to determine what was necessary to construct this canal through the public lands of the United States.

So the project of the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway and of the canal referred to, projects which have now been enlarged until they will carry increased commerce, has been a concern of the United States for more than a century. It has not been the concern of any particular locality; but the concern of the people of the United States represented in their Congress.

In 1822 the Congress of the United States passed an act authorizing the State of Illinois to open a canal—

> Through the public lands * * * connecting the Illinois River with the southern bend of Lake Michigan—

But the State of Illinois was unable to finance this construction at that time. Five years later, in 1827, Congress passed a second act authorizing the State of Illinois to open this canal, and granted to the State—> for the purpose of aiding the said State in opening a canal to unite the waters of Illinois River with those of Lake Michigan, a quantity of land * * * subject to the disposal of the legislature of the said State, for the purpose aforesaid and no other.

This grant of land amounted to 284,000 acres (Annual Report Chief of Engineers, 1887, p. 2141).

The real moving cause for trying to find a waterway and an outlet from the Lakes and for adopting this project, as I have said, was the attitude of the British Government. I am not going back to fight any previous wars, but it remains plain that shortly after the Revolution and shortly after the War of 1812 the attitude of the British Government was not friendly.

As is plainly seen from the correspondence between Mr. Rush and Mr. Adams, the United States maintained that upon the soundest principles of public law American citizens were legally entitled to navigate the St. Lawrence River, and a further statement to the same effect is found in a letter from Henry Clay to Albert Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Great Britain, dated June 19, 1826, which appears at page 23 of Document 43, State Executive Papers, first session, Twentieth Congress.

Notwithstanding the United States Government's perfectly justifiable position, the British Government, in the year 1827, refused to enter into any negotiations regarding the St. Lawrence River, as will be seen from the correspondence between Albert Gallatin and Henry Clay, dated September 21, 1827, to be found at page 31 of Document 43, State Executive Papers, Twentieth Congress, first session, in which the following appears:

> The British plenipotentiaries will not entertain any proposition respecting the navigation of the St. Lawrence River, founded on the right claimed by the United States to navigate that river to the sea.

The Illinois and Michigan Canal, pursuant to the acts of Congress, was opened in 1848. The original design was for a deep-cut canal fed by gravity flow from Lake Michigan, but it was built on the shallow-cut plan on account of lack of funds. The canal took 12 years to build and was completed in 1848 by the State of Illinois at a cost of $6,557,681.50. It was 6 feet deep and 40 feet wide, and was fed partially by gravity flow from the Calumet River through the Calumet feeder which connected with it at the village of Sag, Ill., and by water pumped from the Chicago River up into the canal at Ashland Avenue where its locks were located. It was a great aid to commerce in the Mississippi Valley and Great Lakes regions, despite the fact that frequently for months at a time the Illinois River was only 20 inches deep. (See Annual Report Chief of Engineers, 1887, p. 2143, and Brown's History, pp. 208 and 211; RECORD, p. 1087.)

So back as far as 1848, by authority and by the recommendation of the Government through the action of Congress, the Illinois and Michigan Canal was built and put in operation, and in 1866 the War Department recommended the canal's enlargement.

Pursuant to the Rivers and Harbors Act of June 23, 1866, General Wilson presented a report of a survey for the improvement of this waterway, and after stating the great necessity for the development and enlargement of the same, said:

> * * * The Illinois River seems to have been especially designed by nature as the line by which the waters of Lake Michigan are to be connected with those of the Mississippi. * * * A moment's consideration will show that at no remote period the waters of the lake must have been carried off by these streams, as well as by the St. Lawrence. * * * The data herein contained, together with the existence of a canal of limited capacity already in operation, demonstrate beyond a doubt that the waters of the lake may be carried into the Illinois River through a navigable channel of any required dimensions and at a cost which cannot be regarded as excessive when the objects to be obtained are duly considered. (See Annual Report Chief of Engineers, 1868, p. 438.)

In 1868, at the next session of Congress, we find more concerning the Illinois and Mississippi Canal. In the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, in 1868, page 450, we find this statement:

> There are but two ways in which we can thoroughly protect our northern frontier in times of war and relieve ourselves of a continuous menace in times of peace. As a military measure, the construction of a canal will be effective, and, fortunately for this country, this can be done at an expense which must be regarded as insignificant when compared with the objects to be attained. But great as are the military reasons which favor the establishment of steamboat navigation between the Lakes and the Mississippi, they are vastly transcended by those of a commercial and political character.

Illinois and the Nation were committed to this project from an early date. The Government closely observed the operation of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and during the period from 1848 to 1890 caused a number of surveys to be made of it and the entire Illinois River project, and a summary of the general tenor of these reports is as follows:

> The question of a through line of water communication from the Mississippi to Lake Michigan via the Illinois River has been before Congress since an early date. * * * The several surveys and reports made give so complete a description of the physical characteristics of the route and present the arguments in favor of its improvement so forcibly that it seems unnecessary to extend what has been so fully set forth before. (See A.R. Chief of Engineers, 1880, p. 1995. CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 1082–83.)

In 1884 we find in the annual report of the Chief of Engineers the following:

> The necessity of the improvement derives its importance from several considerations. The State has improved the river for ship navigation from La Salle to Copperas Creek, and the Government is now engaged in continuing the improvement thence to the mouth.

I am citing these in reply to the accusation that was hurled upon the floor that this is a sectional matter; that it is a matter in which there is only local interest. I am doing it to show the history of the development of the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway was a concern of the United States, was encouraged by the United States Government, even before there was such a place as the city of Chicago.

In the annual report of the Chief of Engineers of 1887, at pages 20–21, we find the following:

> The ultimate object of this improvement is to provide a channel way from the lower end of Lake Michigan to the Mississippi River of sufficient capacity to accommodate large-sized Mississippi River boats, so that the products of the country may be carried from the lake to the Gulf without breaking bulk; also to enable vessels of war of considerable capacity to pass freely from the Gulf of Mexico into the defenseless waters of our northern lakes, should the exigencies of our foreign relations ever require this to be done.

There was considerable criticism from the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on account of the fact that my colleague [Mr. LEWIS] pointed out the dangers to this country in constructing a canal that would lead into that system of inland sea which was under the complete control of a foreign government. It seems that that fear expressed by my colleague, which I assume will be branded as an imaginary fear, was a fear expressed by the Government through its agents and that the necessity for this waterway was recognized not only for commercial but for military purposes.

Again in 1887, in the annual report of the Chief of Engineers, at pages 21–22, we find the following:

The United States and the State of Illinois have long been committed to the project of opening a water communication between the Mississippi River and the northern lakes of capacity sufficient for the wants of a commerce and for the exigencies of our national defense should these ever arise. * * *

Pushing this improvement through to the lake, the connecting link will be formed which will join the northern lakes with the vast network of navigable rivers whose waters flow into the Gulf of Mexico on a scale to a certain degree commensurate with the importance of the commerce that will be affected by it. The mere fact that such a route is available will serve as a wholesome regulator to the rates that would be exacted by other methods of transportation were this one not in existence. * * * The problem of connecting Lake Michigan with the Mississippi River by a commodious waterway that could be used for commercial, military, and naval purposes has received attention from our most thoughtful statesmen from the day of Albert Gallatin to the present. * * * The Board of Engineers, appointed under provisions of the River and Harbors Act approved August 5, 1886, to examine and report upon the Illinois and Michigan Canal and the proposed Hennepin Canal says in its report (H.Ex. Doc., No. 79, 49th Cong., 2d sess.) that "The waterway from Chicago to Grafton, on the Mississippi River, is a most important one, and when completed there is little doubt that it will richly pay for itself in the reduction and regulation of freights."

That was as far back as 1888, and that was before the sanitary district of Chicago was even in existence.

In 1889 a law was enacted in the State of Illinois which had for its purpose the furthering of this great waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf and incidentally embodied in its purpose the matter of improving the sanitary conditions of the harbor of Chicago and improving the health conditions of that particular locality. Pursuant to that act passed by the Illinois Legislature a municipal corporation was formed, an agency of the State of Illinois, to dig and improve canals from the Chicago River to Lockport. The law provided what the capacity of the canal should be and provided what the flow of water should be through the canal in case that sewage was turned into it. Pursuant to that statute this organization began the construction of improved links of this great waterway that had been the concern of the Federal Government for more than a century.

I read from the brief of the Mississippi River Association a history of the Chicago Sanitary Ship Canal:

The sanitary district of Chicago was organized under an act passed by the Illinois State Legislature in 1889. Its main outlet, the Chicago Sanitary and Ship Canal, from Chicago to Lockport, was constructed 1892 to 1900 and opened January 1900. This channel was extended to Joliet 1903 to 1907. The auxiliary North Shore Channel was constructed 1908 to 1910 and the supplementary Calumet-Sag Channel was constructed 1911 to 1922. The main channel was opened under a permit from the Secretary of War, granted May 8, 1899, authorizing a flow of water of 5,000 cubic feet per second from the Chicago River into this channel. This water was, of course, diverted from Lake Michigan. This order of the Secretary of War was amended April 9, 1901, and the flow restricted to 3,333 cubic feet per second; was again amended July 23, 1901, permitting a flow of 5,000 cubic feet per second during the hours from 4 p.m. till midnight of each day; and was again amended December 5, 1901, to permit a flow of 4,167 cubic feet of water "through the Chicago River" during the entire day. A temporary modification of this last order was made January 7, 1903, permitting an increase in the flow through the Chicago River to 5,833 cubic feet per second until March 31, 1903. With this exception the permit of the Secretary of War of December 5, 1901, remained in effect until March 3, 1925, when Secretary of War John W. Weeks authorized a diversion from Lake Michigan through the channels of the sanitary district of an amount of water not to exceed an annual average of 8,500 cubic feet per second. This permit expired by limitation on December 31, 1929, and on this same date Secretary of War Patrick J. Hurley granted a permit to the sanitary district of Chicago to divert water from Lake Michigan at such an annual average rate that the total flow at the Lockport end of the main drainage canal would not exceed 8,500 cubic feet per second, including domestic pumpage. This restriction applied until July 1, 1930. On June 26, 1930, the Secretary of War granted the sanitary district the permit for diversion of water from Lake Michigan which is now in force. This permit provides that the diversion shall not exceed the amounts specified in the decree of the Supreme Court of April 21, 1930, which are as follows:

On and after July 1, 1930, not in excess of 6,500 cubic feet per second in addition to domestic pumpage.

On and after December 31, 1935, not in excess of 5,000 cubic feet per second in addition to domestic pumpage.

On and after December 31, 1938, not in excess of 1,500 cubic feet per second in addition to domestic pumpage.

The main point at issue in the litigation between the United States and the sanitary district of Chicago, in the Federal courts from 1908 to 1924, was the question of the authority of the Secretary of War to regulate the diversion from Lake Michigan. This litigation was started as a friendly suit in 1908 to determine the extent of his authority. A second suit was filed by the Government in 1913 to restrain the sanitary district from diverting more water than had been authorized by the Secretary of War. The two suits were consolidated for trial and in the decision of the Supreme Court of January 5, 1925, the authority of the Secretary of War to regulate the diversion was upheld.

That is all there was to the litigation up to that particular time. Eventually, in 1922, the State of Wisconsin started a suit that had for its purpose the prohibiting of the withdrawal of any water. They afterward modified or amended their complaint in that particular suit and that was finally tried and a decree rendered. I shall take up the matter of that particular decree and give it my attention later.

The Rivers and Harbor Act of July 3, 1930, provided:

That as soon as practicable after the Illinois waterway shall have been completed in accordance with this act, the Secretary of War shall cause a study of the amount of water that will be required as an annual average flow to meet the needs of a commercially useful waterway, as defined in said Senate document, and shall, on or before January 31, 1938, report to the Congress the results of such study, with his recommendations as to the minimum amount of such flow that will be required annually to meet the needs of such waterway, and that will not substantially injure the existing navigation on the Great Lakes, to the end that Congress may take such action as it may deem advisable (Public, No. 520, 71st Cong., H.R. 11781).

Let it be remembered that this is the first time the Government of the United States did anything to give itself actual control of this particular canal. It encouraged the construction of the Illinois-Michigan Canal, it encouraged the improvement of it, but all the time the jurisdiction of the canal remained in the sovereign State of Illinois until the River and Harbor Act of 1930, when the Federal Government assumed control of the waterway. That was after the litigation had all been concluded. As I said, this was the law of the land at the time this treaty was signed by the former President of the United States and submitted to the Senate for ratification.

This Rivers and Harbors Act of July 3, 1930, provides that after the Illinois waterway shall have been completed, the Secretary of War shall cause a study of the amount of water that will be required to meet the needs of a commercially useful waterway, and shall, on or before January 31, 1938, report to Congress the results of such study with his recommendations, to the end that Congress may take such action as it may deem advisable.

Strange to say, while that law was in existence, and while that law was binding upon every official in the United States, a treaty was drawn up and signed, before the Illinois waterway was completed, and before there was any chance to make any observations and determine what amount of water was necessary to supply the needs of navigation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. DIETERICH. I do.

Mr. PITTMAN. Is the amount of water limited in the treaty in conflict with the report of the engineers made on December 1, 1933?

Mr. DIETERICH. Let me say again that the report of the engineers made December 1, 1933, expresses a doubt, and says that they are not able to determine what minimum amount of water is necessary. The division engineer so reports. The Chief of Engineers so reports. The board report that they are unable to determine.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not want to take up the Senator's time, but I have here reports that do not seem to be in accord with the Senator's interpretation which I will read after he is through.

Mr. DIETERICH. I may say to the Senator that I had some difficulty in getting this report. It is supposed to be a House document, but it is not printed, and it is not available to the Senate. I know what is shown by the excerpts that I had copied from that report. If the report is finally printed, I do not know what it will show. I hope it will show what the original report is.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I ask to what report the Senator refers?

Mr. DIETERICH. It is a report that was submitted with the President's message, but has not found its way into print, and is not yet available.

Mr. LONG. Why can we not get that report?

Mr. DIETERICH. Because it is in the hands of the Printer, and he cannot finish it for 2 or 3 weeks, I understand.

Mr. LONG. How many pages does the report contain, may I ask the Senator? Is it a very long one?

Mr. DIETERICH. No; it is not a very voluminous report.

Mr. LONG. I was wondering what is all the mystery about the document, and why we cannot get it.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Louisiana is always involved in mystery; but there is no mystery at all about this document. The proof of the report is out. The printers are working on it as hard as they can. They are working on it day and night; but it contains a number of graphs and curves and maps that they say are quite difficult to prepare. What I am trying to get them to do is to give us a temporary print of the report, if they can, without these highly finished maps and graphs, for the use of the Senate. I think possibly we will have the temporary print here in 2 or 3 days.

Mr. DIETERICH. I desire to say to the Senate that I am going to turn my attention to that particular report; and that particular report will show that Mr. Hoover, when he signed the treaty, could not have had any idea as to what was necessary to comply with the requirements of this law, because the waterway was not completed. The waterway was completed in July 1933 and the report was made in December 1933. He had 6 months' time in which to observe; and very craftily both the district engineer, the division engineer, and all the rest of them that had anything to do with the matter left a loophole so that if it does not do what they thought it would do, they can say, "Well, we expressed our doubt."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one more question to get my own mind clear?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. LONG. As a matter of fact, as I remember—I looked up the thing and put it in the record here—this so-called "treaty" was signed not a great while after we had the two national conventions in Chicago. It was signed ahead of the report, was it not?

Mr. DIETERICH. Oh, yes. There was no report in existence and no investigation had been made.

Mr. LONG. So they have a perfect alibi.

Mr. DIETERICH. Of course, the history of the treaty is so much involved in gossip that I do not like to say what my understanding is of the matter of the treaty finally being consummated. It was evident that some party was going to use it as a political asset and it was evident that a great deal of pressure was brought to bear upon the engineers. It is evident that our engineers were told that they must report out a treaty, and it is evident that our engineers have reversed their previous position on the matter, and it is evident that the President asked for a report to be made. That is in a part of the record here.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. DIETERICH. How much that pressure was, no one knows. I am not talking about the present President of the United States. I am talking about the former President, who, the wag has said, was the best President of the United States that Great Britain ever had. [Laughter.]

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I rise simply to say that I think the Senator is rather hasty when he charges that the Board of Engineers of the United States, composed of the most distinguished engineers in the world, are subject to the coercion of any government whatever. I think the history of the Board of Engineers from the very beginning discloses the fact that no power has ever been able to crowd the making of a report by them, or induce them to make any report that was not based upon their scientific judgment as they individually saw the matter and without any influence whatever.

Mr. DIETERICH. Before the Senator finishes, does he say that the report transmitted with this waterway treaty does not show that the engineers were requested to make a report and that they were hurried by the Government in making it?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is quite a lot of difference between asking a board of engineers to expedite work and the insinuation which I interpreted the Senator's remarks to contain, that he was reflecting upon the judgment of these men.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I resent the remarks of the Senator in interpreting what I said as reflecting upon the Army engineers. If I made any assertion that could be construed in that manner I want to correct it now, because I have just as high a regard for the Army engineers as the Senator has. I know that they are honorable men, and I also know that when they are directed to do something they do that particular thing. That does not say that they were directed to make a report that was improper.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, evidently the Senator did not intend to say what he did say, or else the Senator from Nevada misinterpreted his statement. I am very happy that we are in agreement in that particular.

Mr. DIETERICH. I desire to say to the Senator from Nevada that if I made any remark that may be so construed I assure him that it was not intended in that way. I am not here to cast any aspersions upon any officer of the Government or upon any Member of this body. I have a right to assume that they are acting from conscientious motives. I only ask the same right that they ask for themselves. We are a part of the treaty-making power, made so by the Constitution. It is our duty to differ from the President if we conscientiously think he has fallen into error, as much as it is our duty to uphold him when we think he is right in a particular thing.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. DIETERICH. I do.

Mr. LONG. Did I not understand the Senator to say that the engineers had changed their opinion as compared to some other report they had made?

Mr. DIETERICH. I understand that our engineers were in favor of a one-stage development of the St. Lawrence project at the International Rapids, and had held out for that for a long, long while; that the Canadian engineers were in favor of the two-stage development; and I understand that the wishes of the Canadian engineers were finally acceded to. That is not saying that anybody acted corruptly, improperly, or wrongfully.

Mr. LONG. No; and we do not act corruptly when we change our political ideas. We politicians are honest. So are the engineers honest; but this thing was a political matter. It got into two political party organizations, and the next thing we knew they were taking Canada's idea of the thing instead of America's idea of the thing. Until this politics started we never heard of the Canadian idea.

Mr. DIETERICH. I do not think politics should have any place in the consideration of this treaty by the Senate. I think that is one place where we ought to forget partisanship.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DIETERICH. I do.

Mr. SCHALL. The Senator just made the statement that the former President was the best President of the United States that Great Britain ever had.

Mr. DIETERICH. No; the Senator misquotes me. I said the wag had said that.

Mr. SCHALL. Oh, the wag?

Mr. DIETERICH. I said the wag had said he was the best President of the United States that Great Britain ever had.

Mr. SCHALL. Does not the Senator think the wag should include this administration, since they are both exactly on all fours on this treaty?

Mr. DIETERICH. Oh, I do not think there is any comparison between the two men. Because they happen to harmonize on this treaty, I do not think there is any comparison at all.

Mr. SCHALL. But was it not this treaty upon which the Senator was speaking, and from which he drew his conclusions as to what the wag had said?

Mr. DIETERICH. I think the present President has been misled by his advisers. I think he has been wrongfully advised. I do not think they have given him fair advice. As far as the two men are concerned, in my mind—of course, I just speak for myself as one individual here; I am not speaking as a Member of the Senate—I do not think there is any comparison at all.

Mr. SCHALL. Neither do I.

Mr. DIETERICH (continuing). Mr. President—

This is the present law of the land. Since the waterway is to be opened in the spring of 1933—

This treaty was written in 1932—and the report as to the amount of water needed for its operation does not have to be presented before January 1938 there is a period of 5 years in which actual observations of operations can be made and the real needs can be determined under actual operating conditions.

That was a sensible, safe proposition, but that law was not complied with.

Nothing could be more fair or more reasonable than this procedure. Then since a report must be made to Congress by January 31, 1938, and since the diversion of water from Lake Michigan is not required to be reduced to its minimum of 1,500 feet per second until December 31, 1938, under the Supreme Court decree of April 21, 1930, and the permit of June 26, 1930, there is a period of 11 months in which Congress can take such action as it deems advisable.

Why was not that particular provision carried out? Why was not this treaty drawn in such a way that it took cognizance of the laws passed by Congress? Why was the will of Congress disregarded in the matter of the framing of this treaty? Why was it narrowed down and restricted to a decision of the court rendered in a matter in which the needs of navigation were not taken into consideration, and the only question taken into consideration was the question of its effect upon the Chicago River and as a part of the harbor of the city of Chicago?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I cannot let that statement go unchallenged. I know that is the Senator's contention, but I think the decision which I read this morning, rendered no later than the spring of 1933, shows conclusively that not only the sanitary district but the State of Illinois have attempted from the beginning of this litigation to justify a diversion not only upon the ground of sanitation but also upon the ground of navigation. The Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Chief Justice Hughes—who handed down the decision and who, by the way, was the first master to whom this controversy was submitted—held that the Court could not sustain the contention upon the part of the sanitary district that excessive diversion was required for navigation.

Mr. DIETERICH. If the Senator will pardon me, I am going to get to that; and possibly the Senator had better withhold his remarks on this subject until I have finished. I have very patiently listened to the Senator——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no desire to interrupt the Senator if he prefers to proceed with his argument.

Mr. DIETERICH. Yes; I prefer to proceed, but I do not want to deny the Senator the right to differ with me and to express his differences. I am just as anxious as is the Senator from Wisconsin to know what the issue in question is. There should not be any difference of opinion, however, with respect to a Supreme Court decision, as to what were the issues involved in that case. Of course, if it is the Senator's idea that that was presented or urged, and he is in error on that proposition, then perhaps the matter of urging this treaty is error.

Reverting to the question of determining the amount of water necessary to maintain navigation after 5 years' observation:

Perhaps no action by Congress will be necessary, but there certainly is no relation whatever between the Supreme Court decree of April 21, 1930, and the needs of navigation in the Illinois River. In the trial of the Great Lakes case before the Supreme Court, on rereference to the Special Master Charles Evans Hughes, any consideration of the Illinois River was specifically excluded from the case.

This has to do with the contention the Senator has said he could not let go by unchallenged.

On page 4 of the report of the special master on rereference the issues are stated to be:

"(1) What are the practical measures necessary for the disposition of the sewage of the sanitary district of Chicago through other means than the diversion of water from Lake Michigan?

"(2) Within what time can these sewage-disposal works be completed and put into operation?

"(3) What reductions in the diversion will be practicable immediately, and from time to time, pending the completion of the sewage-disposal plants?

"(4) What diversion, if any, of water from Lake Michigan will be necessary for the purpose of maintaining navigation in the Chicago River, as a part of the port of Chicago, after these sewage-disposal works are in full operation?"

Those were the issues. There was no issue in that case as to what will be the needs of a commercially useful waterway, or what is the amount of flow to be diverted through the sanitary district canal as a commercially useful waterway. The entire question was the question of the sanitation of the harbor of Chicago.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is quoting from the special master's report and is referring to the issues involved at the time the case was first referred to the special master. I desire to quote from the opinion rendered by Mr. Hughes, sitting as Chief Justice in the same controversy.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would forbear doing that at the present time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is a very brief quotation, and it is quite in point.

Mr. DIETERICH. Very well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. This decision was rendered at the October term, 1932, long after the matter to which the Senator has referred. I simply desire to quote from the opinion, to be found in volume 289, United States Reports, 395, at page 401:

In this suit the State of Illinois has defended from the beginning upon the ground that diversion was essential with reference not only to the needs of sanitation but also for a continuous waterway from the lake to the Gulf.

Mr. DIETERICH. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Court further said:

But the Court found this contention unavailing and that the existing diversion was unlawful.

That decision, may I say, if the Senator will permit me, was rendered after the Mississippi River States had endeavored to intervene upon the basis of the argument made in the brief from which the Senator is quoting.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I be pardoned if I interrupt my colleague?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. And may I take the liberty of correcting the able Senator from Wisconsin. I was counsel in the cause, participating in the arguments in the Supreme Court; and I do not find it at all gratifying to have to include in that also the statement truthfully that I was not victorious. The issue, however, was this: The Supreme Court in previous decisions, as the Senator from Wisconsin has previously correctly stated, had held that Chicago must take some steps to avoid diverting the amount of water which was being diverted and adopt some mechanical method to reach the conclusion necessary, as she felt, to the welfare of her people.

The question came before the court with a view of having an extension of time wherein to do this work, upon the further basis that the full limit of taxation had been reached in Chicago, and that it could go no further in obtaining funds with which to begin the construction.

A special master was appointed to look into this subject. He went to the city of Chicago, took testimony upon the question of the mechanical advance, the time necessary within which the construction should be had, and the amount of its cost. He made certain conclusions adverse to the contention of the sanitary district. It was that to which the able Senator from Wisconsin alluded. That was the basis of the appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States after that master's report on those particular phases to which the opinion he has just cited specifically relates. The other matter to which it alludes referred to contentions which were made in the previous case.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator from Illinois, who has the floor, further yield?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield further.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On the contrary, Mr. President, this decision was rendered after the case had been referred to another special master, namely, Mr. McClennen, and after the States of the lower Mississippi River had endeavored to intervene and have the reference to the master broadened to include the very points made by the junior Senator from Illinois. I appeal from the statement of the senior Senator from Illinois as to what the issue was to the exact language of the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court in the most recent decision, which, in my opinion, absolutely controverts the statement just made by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Will not the Senator from Wisconsin concede that this was the appeal from the special master, Mr. McClennen, and came up before the court purely upon the exceptions to that master's report?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will not concede that this whole question of navigation has not from the beginning been one of the bases of an attempt to justify this diversion on the part of the sanitary district and the State of Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. That is another question, which I leave between my colleague from Illinois and the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have further demonstrated that the States of the lower Mississippi endeavored to intervene in this matter, cited the statute which has been quoted, the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1930, which is also quoted in the brief from which the junior Senator from Illinois has been reading and that the petition on the part of these lower Mississippi River States to enlarge the questions referred to the master upon the basis of navigation was denied by the Supreme Court; and after this long controversy the Supreme Court, in the unanimous decision given by Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, said:

> In this suit, the State of Illinois has defended from the beginning upon the ground that diversion was essential with reference not only to the needs of sanitation, but also for a continuous waterway from the Lake to the Gulf. But the court found this contention unavailing and that the existing diversion was unlawful.

Mr. LEWIS. I again invite the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin, and I repeat that he will observe that the Chief Justice is alluding to a previous litigation when he said "the Court found", meaning in the past tense that in some previous instance the Court had found to be ill-founded the contentions which he claimed were made by the district. But I ask the Senator, am I not correct when I state that the present appeal to which he alludes was an appeal from the finding of that special master—not Master Hughes but the special master—who had been sent down to investigate the questions which the district raised in asking for further time and for further privileges? Is that not an opinion wholly in answer to the exceptions by the district to the report of that special master, Mr. McClennen, not to that of Master Hughes?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Why, certainly. That is just the point I have been making.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I think we are clear on that matter; and I shall no longer delay my colleague the junior Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Illinois has been citing references to Master Hughes' findings. This opinion by Chief Justice Hughes states the facts which I submit upon the record cannot be successfully contradicted.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I undersand the position of the Senator from Wisconsin very thoroughly. It is true that they said the sanitary district had urged, as an excuse for its request to be permitted to divert water, the needs of navigation. It said it had urged that from the beginning; and the question of navigation was never a question at issue. I will read it again, and the more we read it the more we find that the Supreme Court said that that was not a proper issue in the case.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator. The testimony taken by the master is replete with evidence from witnesses introduced by the sanitary district and the State of Illinois, attempting to justify this diversion upon the ground that it was necessary for navigation.

Mr. DIETERICH. The court would not consider the question of what was necessary for navigation, because it was not involved.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Precisely. The court threw out the application of the lower Mississippi River States to intervene on the basis of the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1930, and upon the basis that diversion was necessary and justified for the purpose of navigation on the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway. The court denied their contentions.

[At this point Mr. DIETERICH yielded the floor for the day.]

Thursday, February 1, 1934

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, just before the colloquy took place yesterday between the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] I had stated the points upon which the lake-level controversy was rereferred to the master. A reading of the report makes it very clear that any diversion from Lake Michigan considered in the trial of this case on reference had to do solely with maintaining navigation in the Chicago River as a part of the port of Chicago. Furthermore such consideration was in the interest of navigation on the Great Lakes and had no reference whatever to the Illinois River or the Lakes-to-Gulf waterway. The idea is preposterous that this waterway should be throttled because the court rendered a certain decree in a case in which the needs of the waterway were not even considered and in which the advocates of the waterway could not even be heard.

General Jadwin, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, was called as a witness by Special Master Hughes in the trial of the Great Lakes case on rereference in 1929. In a formal statement to the court on the question of controlling the work in the Chicago River he said:

The discussion does not modify in any respect the statement heretofore made that an average diversion of 5,000 cubic feet per second will be necessary to maintain navigation in the Illinois River as contemplated by existing authority of Congress and under the plans of improvement now under way.

That language can be found in the House report at page 109. In the same statement, discussing different locations for the suggested controlling works in the Chicago River, General Jadwin said:

With either of these statements navigation on the Illinois River as contemplated in the existing project will be impracticable unless the basic diversion is fixed at or above 5,000 cubic second-feet.

That statement can be found at page 111 of the Hughes report on rereference.

General Jadwin was a member of the Joint Board of Engineers on the St. Lawrence waterway project. The original trial of the Great Lakes case in 1926–27 before Charles Evans Hughes, special master appointed by the Supreme Court to take evidence in that Court and report the findings of fact and conclusions of law to be as to the effect of the diversion of water from Lake Michigan upon the Illinois River.

In this connection Judge Hughes reported the finding of fact to the Court as follows:

The lower Illinois River from Utica to Grafton on the Mississippi, 230 miles, is a shallow sluggish stream carrying from 500 to 1,000 cubic feet per second of natural low-water flow. In its natural state it is inadequate for modern river navigation. The Federal project depth has been 7 feet; but this could not have been maintained without at least 8,500 cubic feet per second from Lake Michigan, which gives in the lower Illinois about 4 feet of low-water depth of 7 feet. The Chicago diversion has increased the navigable capacity of the river.

Continuing further, he said:

Reference has already been made to the report of Colonel Judson of March 1921, and that of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors of October 1921 with respect to the effect of various amounts of diversion on the navigable capacity of the Illinois River and the plans for its improvement.

It will be observed that Colonel Judson stated that "for a 9-foot channel, with an increment of 4,167 second-feet, the cost, either with dams retained or removed, appears almost prohibitive", and his recommendation was for the adoption of the 8-foot project "based on 7,500 second-feet withdrawal for the purpose of estimate and with all dams removed." He added that with the withdrawal of 10,000 second-feet from Lake Michigan that increment would of itself have increased the depth to 9 feet.

Col. W. C. Weeks, United States district engineer at Chicago, in his report December 20, 1929, in discussing the Federal project in the Illinois River, stated:

"Dredging is now under contract throughout the length of the Federal project and will provide a minimum 9-foot depth for navigation, with a flow of 6,700 cubic feet per second at Utica and 7,200 cubic feet per second at Grafton. This flow, assumed as a basis for an estimate of dredging quantities, corresponds to a low-water flow of 6,000 second-feet at Lockport plus the increment of the average low-water flow of the Kankakee and Fox Rivers."

At the hearings before the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate, Seventy-first Congress, second session, on H.R. 11781, for the construction of river and harbor works, on May 16, 1930, Gen. Lytle Brown, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, testified regarding the amount of water needed to make the Lakes-to-Gulf waterway commercially useful. At page 326 of the printed record of those hearings is the following question by Senator VANDENBERG:

What is your present judgment as to the smallest flow of water that is necessary to develop a commercially useful waterway of this kind?

General Brown's reply was:

The indications are, with everything in view, that something like 5,000 feet per second should be held available for that purpose.

On page 327 of the same record is the following statement by General Brown, and I should like to invite the particular attention of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to this. I am quoting now from page 327 of the record of the hearings before the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate of the Seventy-first Congress, where General Brown said:

Well, my idea of about what the Supreme Court took into consideration is based on the testimony that General Jadwin gave them, and General Jadwin's testimony, as I remember, was based on Chicago Harbor only, and that was 1,500 cubic feet per second. We have got an entirely different proposition now than Chicago Harbor only. We have got the waterway all the way from the Lakes to the Mississippi River.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GIBSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Am I to infer from that quotation from General Brown to which the Senator just referred that he contends that General Jadwin's testimony was the only testimony in the record of these long legal proceedings relating to the use of water for navigation?

Mr. DIETERICH. I do not contend that, but I contend, as General Brown does, that General Jadwin's testimony was considered the important testimony upon which the opinion of the Supreme Court was based.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I cannot concede the deduction made by the Senator, because the record is replete with testimony from other engineers and other experts upon the question of navigation. The record speaks for itself.

Mr. DIETERICH. The record speaks for itself, but there was no issue that raised the question of the navigability of the Illinois River or the Illinois-Mississippi waterway. I know the Senator and I differ on that point, and there is no use arguing about it. The Senator bases his entire contention upon some language contained in a later opinion of the Supreme Court in which it was desired to enlarge the decree or the order of the Court rendered in 1930. On that particular hearing, with that petition, that matter was not at issue. What the Senator bases his contention on was mere obiter dictum, had nothing to do with the case, and was not binding on anyone.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I contend that the statement of Chief Justice Hughes in the recent opinion, rendered only last spring, is more conclusive as to the question of whether or not navigation, and the use of water for that purpose, has been an issue in these cases. In that opinion the Chief Justice states in so many words that the State of Illinois and the sanitary district have endeavored to defend on the ground of the use of this water for navigation.

Mr. DIETERICH. I am quite familiar with the opinion. I read it last night. There was no issue before the Court that required any language of that kind to be used by the Court, or any determination of that kind by the Court. What the Senator has read is mere obiter dictum, not binding upon anybody, was not with relation to an issue presented to the Court, and was just said by way of passing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I submit that the statement of Chief Justice Hughes in the most recent opinion which the Court has rendered—a man who sat as the master when this controversy between the Lake States and the sanitary district was first referred to him—is more conclusive upon the question of whether or not the State of Illinois and the sanitary district have attempted to defend this diversion on the basis of the need of water for navigation than the opinion of the Chief of Engineers on what he thought the Supreme Court had in mind when it rendered its decision.

Mr. DIETERICH. The Senator from Wisconsin is in error in his construction of what Chief Justice Hughes said. Chief Justice Hughes never used any language in that opinion, either in passing upon the issues involved in that case or by way of passing, that indicated that in the determination of this controversy the question of the sufficiency of the flow of water to provide for a commercially useful navigable waterway was involved.

On page 265 of the same printed record——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois further yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. DIETERICH. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It may be that I can not understand the English language; but upon the point which the Senator is now attempting to inject into this discussion I submit this language of the Court:

In this suit the State of Illinois has defended from the beginning—

"Defense" means, of course, that testimony has been introduced; and if we were going to retry these cases entirely in the Senate of the United States, I could bring upon the floor hundreds upon hundreds of pages of testimony injected by the sanitary district——

Mr. DIETERICH. I do not care to interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin, but I think that is what we are doing now—retrying the case of Wisconsin against Illinois.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; what the Senator from Illinois is doing is attempting to appeal from all of these decisions of the Supreme Court and to secure their reversal by reservation to this treaty; but, if the Senator will be so courteous, I should like just to read this language.

Mr. DIETERICH. I think the Senator has that language in the RECORD at least four times.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to put it in again:

In this suit the State of Illinois has defended from the beginning upon the ground that diversion was essential with reference not only to the needs of sanitation but also for a continuous waterway from the lake to the Gulf.

Mr. DIETERICH. And I pointed out yesterday where the matter that was submitted to the commissioner appointed to take the testimony did not raise the question of the sufficiency of the waterway, and I do not care to reargue that matter. It was not an issue in that case. The only issue was the question of the amount of water necessary to be withdrawn in order to protect the harbor of Chicago, and the Chicago River as a part of that harbor, and no part of the necessity for a commercially useful waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the testimony taken by the masters in this case will show hundreds of pages of testimony of witnesses called to testify on that very point.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I may say by way of passing that I am somewhat fearful that the construction of this litigation by the Senator from Wisconsin, and his advice, are in some manner responsible for the President being misled into sending this message here.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to absolve the President of the United States from inability to reach a conclusion without advice upon a matter which he has studied more thoroughly and to which he has given more time and consideration than any man in this body or outside of it.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I expected the Senator from Wisconsin to rise nobly in defense of the President of the United States. He has no higher opinion of the President of the United States than I have, and could not have any higher opinion. I understand that the Senator has advised with him on this question. The Senator does not deny that, does he?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I will advise the Senator that I have never discussed with the President of the United States the details of the terms of this treaty.

Mr. DIETERICH. I do not know about the details of the terms of the treaty.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Nor any of the issues involved in diversion.

Mr. DIETERICH. Nor the treaty?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course, I have discussed the question——

Mr. DIETERICH. Of course the Senator has. He produced a letter from the President here at the special session last spring and improperly injected it into the RECORD here, because while that letter stated that it could be used for any purpose, it is a fixed and an ancient rule, as I understand, that no one has a right to quote the opinion of the President of the United States in a matter of this kind, or in a matter of pending legislation. If the President desires to make his wishes known, he submits a message, as he did in this case, and does not write a personal letter for a Senator to use in this representative Hall.

There is not any question but that the Senator from Wisconsin, with his ability and his influence, is in a great measure responsible for the President's attitude upon the present treaty; and the attitude that the President has assumed, as will be disclosed in this debate, is founded upon an erroneous attitude of the Senator from Wisconsin, who is still fighting the battle between Wisconsin and Illinois on broad national grounds.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. DIETERICH. I will yield briefly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Since the Senator from Illinois has attempted to place a misconstruction upon my conferences with the President of the United States concerning this matter, I think he should have the courtesy to yield to permit me to reply. If he does not care to do so, I will reply in my own time.

Mr. DIETERICH. That will be perfectly proper. I have no control whatever of the Senator's language or his actions in the Senate. I am responsible only for my own. What I said was no discourtesy and no reflection upon the Senator because it was perfectly proper for him to advise with the Chief Executive on any matter about which he had advice that he thought the Chief Executive should have or about which the Chief Executive requested advice. There is no reflection either on him or on the President of the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois further yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator stated that I had discussed this treaty with the President of the United States and had been largely responsible for his attitude upon it.

Mr. DIETERICH. I did not state that as a fact. I want to correct the Senator before he argues on that as a premise. I said I was fearful of that. I did not say that as a fact and I only gathered it from the circumstances.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not wish any misstatement of fact to be made or any misconstruction to be placed upon the situation. I state here and now that I have never discussed the terms of this treaty, or the issues involved in it, with the President of the United States. I have discussed with him the question of whether or not this treaty should be taken up for consideration. I urged upon him at the last session that he should ask the Senate to consider this treaty.

As to my use of the letter which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the last special session in relation to the joint resolution which had passed the House of Representatives, and which I offered as an amendment to the Industrial Recovery Act, I wish to say that I had the permission of the President of the United States to present that letter as I did to the Senate. I may say further that the question of whether or not the President of the United States has a right to communicate with a Member of Congress is a matter for his determination, and not that of the junior Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIETERICH. I appreciate that very well. I assume that when a letter is written, it is written to be used wherever it is proper to be used; and anyone writing a letter in that capacity would not expect it to be used where it was not proper.

I do not care to take any more time on that matter.

Mr. PITTMAN rose.

Mr. DIETERICH. Does the Senator from Nevada desire to ask me a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, as Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and in charge of this debate to a certain extent, I feel that there is a personal interest as well as a public interest in this matter on the part of both the States of Wisconsin and Illinois. We all recognize that; but I think there are about 15 States which by their legislative action have endorsed this treaty. So it is not purely a fight between Wisconsin and Illinois.

Just one thing more, however, as to the President being influenced in this matter:

I should feel highly honored if I had been accused of influencing the President of the United States.

Mr. DIETERICH. I should, too.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think also that the Senator from Wisconsin should feel highly honored by the intimation that possibly he has done so. I think the Senator from Illinois may be highly honored if he intends to change the opinion of the President in this matter, because I am going to ask unanimous consent to clear up this whole question by placing in the RECORD the entire correspondence and statements of the President on this subject for the past several years. I think anyone who reads the correspondence and statements will find that the President knows more about this subject than I know.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, of course I do not know what that correspondence is. I do not know whether it is proper. The only trouble about it is that the proponents of this waterway are certainly stressing the fact that the President of the United States has sent a message here. We are not trying the question for or against the President of the United States. It is as much the duty of the Senators from Illinois to prevent the President of the United States from being led into error as it is their duty to sustain him when he is right.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have never raised that question.

Mr. DIETERICH. That question never has been raised; and continuing in relation to what the Senator from Nevada said, I certainly should feel honored if the President had called me to the White House and permitted me to express to him my views and my reasons why this treaty should not be ratified.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, let me make a suggestion, if I may be pardoned by my colleague, to the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

I suggest that these documents, whatever they are, that the able chairman has in mind, be put in the RECORD, and that he also agree that we vote on this treaty, say, before Saturday, or before the close of the session on Saturday, after these documents are put in. Let us dispose of the subject upon the record that the President will make in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the one hand, and that which is being made by the facts as presented by both sides on the other.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I assume that the junior Senator from Illinois is yielding for this purpose?

Mr. DIETERICH. I am yielding for this purpose.

Mr. PITTMAN. I assure the Senator—and I can only speak for myself in this matter—that I am very anxious to have the matter determined as soon as practicable. I assume that that is the viewpoint of others interested in this treaty. However, in view of the fact that five or six reports have been sent up here from the Board of Engineers of the Army, from the Department of Commerce, and from other Departments, giving facts on this matter that have been requested, I feel that those documents should be at the disposal of each Senator before he is required to vote.

We have crowded the printing of the reports, so we may have them as quickly as possible, as I stated yesterday. I should be willing, however, if the Senator wants to ask for unanimous-consent agreement, to vote on this matter on, we will say——

Mr. LEWIS. A week from the present Saturday.

Mr. LONG. Oh, no.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator realizes, of course, that in the meantime there are a number of bills that are going to displace this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in order to shorten the debate, I will say that I will not enter into any unanimous-consent agreement that we vote next Saturday or a week from next Saturday. In good faith, let me say that there are a good many Senators who, I think, want to debate this question in a modest way, but they are willing that both of the Senators from Illinois and the members of the committee who have the burden on their shoulders should first get through with what they want to say. It does not seem to me quite fair for those who have taken 2 or 3 weeks' time in debating this subject to say to those who have not debated the question at all, "We are going to vote tomorrow or next day."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I agree with the able Senator from Nebraska. Had there been any desire to speak indicated by the Senators on the other side of the question, nothing would gratify me any more than to aid in accommodating such desire, but I have heard of no such indication. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who has so ably and thoroughly debated his side of the question, has from time to time made the accusation—he and my able friend from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]—that there is obstruction and a length of time drawn out with the object of somehow or other avoiding coming to a conclusion, and I am meeting that accusation by offering to come to a conclusion at the very earliest date that can be agreed upon. That, Mr. President, was my purpose.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, it seems that a former Senator from Illinois desired some information as to what was the effect of the ruling of the Supreme Court in the much talked of Lakes level controversy, and Senator Deneen on May 10, 1930, addressed a letter to General Brown, I assume with the thought that General Brown had given the matter sufficient study so that he could give him intelligent information on the subject, and General Brown's reply was:

I am not at all sure that the decree of the Supreme Court recently handed down in the suit concerning the diversion between the Lake States and the Chicago Sanitary District, in which the ultimate diversion was placed at 1,500 cubic feet per second, had anything whatever to do with the requirements of navigation. My opinion—

This is General Brown's opinion, for whatever it is worth—

My opinion is that the decree of the Supreme Court was a limitation on the diversion as a means of sewage disposal, and was aimed at the authorities of the sanitary district of Chicago and not at the interests of navigation or the power of Congress in relation thereto.

Continuing further General Brown's letter:

I am of the opinion that at this time no definite figure of the amount of diversion necessary for navigation should be stated.

He certainly has a right to express his opinion on that.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. DIETERICH. I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska in just a moment. The general's letter continues:

And that further study of the completed waterway should be made to ascertain the quantity of water necessary for navigation. It is therefore recommended that any specified diversion be omitted from any authorizing legislation.

That is what we are contending for, that under the law this observation should be made as contemplated in the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1930, for 5 years, and that observation has not been made, and no engineer, no engineering skill, can determine whether or not the amount specified in the decree of the Supreme Court will answer the purposes required to make a commercially useful waterway.

I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I interrupted the Senator in order to correct what might be a misapprehension in what I said a few moments ago about the request of the Senator's colleague to vote a week from Saturday. I meant to say that at the present time I should object to a vote being taken a week from Saturday. At the present time I should object to fixing any time to vote. I do not mean to say, however, that as the debate goes on—and it is more or less exhausted on both sides—I should not consent to a date even before the time suggested by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIETERICH. I am satisfied that my colleague has no disposition to deny any one interested in this question the right to take the time to thoroughly discuss it and give the Senate the benefit of whatever discussion he might make of the treaty.

Major General Brown, Chief of Engineers, the United States Army, in a report dated December 15, 1931, to the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on the Illinois River by Col. W. C. Weeks, dated December 6, 1929, makes the following statement—quoting the statement of Major General Brown:

It is now apparent, however, that the improvement recommended and authorized for the Illinois River between Utica and the mouth, was based on an incomplete appreciation of the needs of modern barge transportation, and that better facilities than are provided in the existing project for this section, as limited by the authorized expenditure, must be afforded if this waterway is to fulfill adequately its intended purpose. The plans for a fully adequate improvement of the Illinois River from Utica to the mouth are dependent upon the diversion from Lake Michigan. The diversion authorized by law is specifically that authorized by the decree of the Supreme Court issued April 21, 1930. The diversion thus authorized by law until December 31, 1938, is regarded as sufficient to provide reasonably adequate navigation under the present plan of improvement for the commerce immediately anticipated pending the full development of this commerce and the construction of adequate terminals for its accommodation. The report to be submitted in accordance with the law will set forth the full improvement required to afford satisfactory navigation for the full commerce anticipated on this important waterway and the minimum amount of flow required for its operation.

That is what we are contending for, that the Senate should not ratify this treaty, which arbitrarily cuts down that flow without any reference as to whether or not it will meet the needs of navigation along the Illinois River on the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, and the law provides that a study should be made thereof; and if the treaty is adopted, then the study cannot be confined to Illinois, because I am reading and I am gathering my facts from a brief submitted by the Mississippi River Association.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Directly on that point I should like to get the Senator's idea, and I am asking mainly for the purpose of information. Does the Senator contend that we have a right, both legal and moral, to take an unlimited supply of water out of Lake Michigan without the consent of the other States having harbors on the Great Lakes and without the consent of Canada?

Mr. DIETERICH. I claim we have the right to divert 10,000 cubic feet of water per second. We were given that right—and if the Senator will listen to me I will eventually get to that—by the treaty of 1909 in reference to the boundary waters, and we were charged with that amount. I claim that there will be no injury to the harbors of the States on the Great Lakes by reason of lowering the level of the Lakes; that compensating works can be constructed, and I think they are provided for in this very treaty, even to compensate for the little amount that is diverted; that they can be constructed in order to compensate the lake levels for the water that is taken.

I further believe that if the question is that of a power development, that the State of Illinois, and that part of the Union, has as much right to take this water and utilize it for power purposes as the State of New York has at the International Rapids. If the Senator from Nebraska, who, I know, is sincere in these matters, will bear with me, I will try to present to him my reasons why I think section 8 of this treaty should be eliminated.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Did I understand the Senator to say that the diversion of 10,000 cubic feet per second was allowed under the treaty of 1909?

Mr. DIETERICH. Under the treaty of 1909 there was no mention made of the diversion of the waters of Lake Michigan, because it was taken as a matter of settled law that a nation had a right to divert whatever water was necessary; that under the law as it existed at that time a nation had the right to the full use and control of whatever waters were located wholly within its national boundaries, regardless of whether or not it would work injury to some other nation farther down. I am sorry the Senator from Minnesota was not here when the question of diversion was discussed. If he will take the time to read my address after it is printed, he will find that the low-water diversion of the Illinois River is—because that was given attention by the Army engineers—from 500 to 1,000 feet.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will be glad to do so. The only reason I interrupted the Senator was because I understood him to say that the diversion of 10,000 feet was arranged for under the terms of the treaty of 1909.

Mr. DIETERICH. It was arranged for and taken into consideration in that treaty, and in the negotiations leading up to that treaty, that we should continuously divert 10,000 second-feet at Chicago, and for that reason a diversion of the water power at Niagara Falls was made, and Canada received some seven or eight thousand second-feet more of water than we did.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I should be very glad to have the Senator show that.

Mr. DIETERICH. I will reach that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Then I shall not further interrupt the Senator.

Mr. DIETERICH. After the sanitary ship canal was constructed the Government of the United States recognizing this improvement caused three distinct surveys to be made of the Illinois Valley for the purpose of ascertaining the cost of a commercially useful waterway. The first survey was made by a board known as the "Barlow Board", which was created under the River and Harbor Act of 1899, which provided for a board of three engineers to make surveys and estimates of cost for improving the Des Plaines and Illinois Rivers with a view of extending navigation from the Illinois River to Lake Michigan, and asked for a report on a 7- and 8-foot channel. A preliminary report was made to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors at the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, and is to be found in Document No. 548.

This is known as the "report of the Barlow Board", and in part is as follows—I am reading from the final report as it was made to the Fifty-sixth Congress by that board:

The board finds the most economic route for waterways of 7 and 8 feet depth to be from Utica to Marseilles in the bed of the river, 11.4 miles; thence around the Marseilles Rapids by canal, 7.4 miles; thence in the bed of the river to near the mouth of the Kankakee River, 21.2 miles; thence by enlarging the Illinois and Michigan Canal to the Joliet Basin, 18.3 miles; thence by the canal through Joliet Basin and along the east bank of the Des Plaines River 4½ miles, connecting with the sanitary canal at Lockport, and thence through the sanitary canal and the Chicago River to Lake Michigan.

Showing that the Government engineers took into consideration this canal, and appreciative of its construction sought to extend a waterway on down to the Mississippi River from the outlet of that canal.

Further the report says:

The sanitary canal having been opened in accordance with the State law and under a provisional permit from the Secretary of War, the flow of the Des Plaines and Illinois Rivers has been increased by a discharge of 5,000 cubic feet per second, which will be raised to the maximum of 10,000 cubic feet per second under the provisions of the State law authorizing the construction of the sanitary canal.

After that, between 1901 and 1904, a board known as the "Ernst Board" made another survey. The Rivers and Harbors Act of June 13, 1902, appropriated $200,000 for the making of such surveys and investigations. They reported upon a waterway 14 feet in depth on a base flow of 10,000 cubic feet per second from that canal. I quote a portion of that report as follows:

In this connection the board states that it does not condemn the present plan of taking 10,000 cubic feet per second, believing as it does that some such amount will be needed to protect the lives and health of the people of a great city and of a populous valley, but it invites attention to the fact that if a much larger amount be taken it will be necessary to construct remedial works elsewhere.

After that the Bixby Board was appointed under the River and Harbor Act of June 25, 1910, which provided a million dollars for a waterway from Lockport to the mouth of the Illinois River. The Bixby Board in its final report, to be found in House Document No. 762, made the following finding:

The special board finds that the diversion of 10,000 cubic feet of water per second through the Chicago Drainage Canal would lower the water surface at mean lake level 0.465 foot in Lake Huron and Lake Michigan, 0.448 foot in Lake Erie, and 0.431 foot in Lake Ontario. It proposes the construction of submerged weirs in Niagara River to hold up the level of Lake Erie and submerged weirs in St. Clair River to hold up the level of Lakes Michigan and Huron at a total estimated cost of $475,000 with $15,000 annually for maintenance. The influence on the volume of the Mississippi River due to any diversion from Lake Michigan will be an increase approximately equal to the amount diverted.

Mr. President, it takes a stretch of the imagination to see how a harbor will be damaged by lowering the level of the water some 0.4 foot. The yearly fluctuation of the lake is greater than that.

Between the years 1903 and 1907 the main channel of the canal was constructed and extended from Lockport to Joliet, and a power house was constructed at a total cost of $4,562,716.

In 1907 the sanitary district constructed at the southern terminus of its main channel near Lockport a power plant to develop power arising from the water passing through the channel and dropping approximately 34 feet at that point to the Des Plaines River. Prior to this time this energy was wasted.

Substantially all the electrical energy produced at this plant is now either consumed by the sanitary district itself in the operation of its various plants or is sold to the city of Chicago for lighting streets or to various park districts for lighting the parks and boulevards of the city, or to other towns and villages adjacent to Chicago, at substantially the cost of production. Very little power is sold to private consumers.

I may say, if it is a question of power, why is it desired to strangle this waterway? Why is it desired to prevent the development of power along the Illinois waterway? If power is useful to the State of New York, why is not that section of the Middle West entitled to the same consideration along these lines, especially when it can be provided without any injury to any one of the sister States?

The settled law of this land in reference to boundary waters at the time when the treaty of 1909 was being negotiated is set out in the report compiled by the International Waterways Commission, which was printed in Canada by order of the Canadian Parliament. I read, beginning at the bottom of page 363 of that report, which contains a reference to the views of former Attorney General Harmon, who, I want to say to the senior Senator from Wisconsin, is one Attorney General who did not concur with what he says. I now read from the report:

It can hardly be disputed that, in the absence of treaty stipulation, a country through which streams have their course, or in which lakes exist, can in the exercise of its sovereign powers rightfully divert or otherwise appropriate the waters within its territory for purposes of irrigation, the improvement of navigation, or for any other purpose which the Government may deem proper. The principle was lucidly stated by Mr. Harmon, Attorney General of the United States, on December 12, 1895, in a communication to the Secretary of State. The question submitted to the Attorney General by the Secretary of State involved the right to appropriate the waters of the upper Rio Grande for irrigation purposes, to the injury of the residents of Mexico, and in giving his opinion the Attorney General laid down the law as follows:

"The fundamental principle of international law is the absolute sovereignty of every nation as against all others within its own territory."

He then quoted from Chief Justice Marshall's opinion in Schooner Exchange v. McFadden (7 Cr., p. 136), the following excerpt:

"The jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself. Any restriction upon it, deriving validity from an external source, would imply a diminution of its sovereignty to the extent of the restriction, and an investment of that sovereignty to the same extent in the power which could impose such restriction.

"All exceptions, therefore, to the full and complete power of a nation within its own territories must be traced up to the consent of the nation itself. They can flow from no other legitimate source."

Great Britain also has insisted upon the same principle in the matter of the navigation of the lower St. Lawrence River.

I am now quoting from the report of the International Waterways Commission, and not from the opinion of Attorney General Harmon:

Great Britain also has insisted upon the same principle in the matter of the navigation of the lower St. Lawrence. The history of the positions taken by the United States and Great Britain need not be recited, but it will be noted that Great Britain did not recede from her position, and simply conceded by treaty the right of navigation upon certain concessions being made by the United States. It would seem, therefore, to be settled international law, recognized in both countries, that the exercise of sovereign power over waters within the jurisdiction of a country cannot be questioned, and that notwithstanding such exercise may take a form that will be injurious to another country through which the waters of the same streams or lakes pass, it cannot be rightfully regarded as furnishing a cause of war.

I think that furnishes some of the information for which the Senator from Nebraska has asked.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I concede that furnishes "some of the information", but the Senator will admit, will he not, that it is not a complete answer?

Mr. DIETERICH. I think it is a complete answer. I do not think there has been any change in the law governing the right of nations to control waters wholly within their own boundaries except, I might say to the Senator from Nebraska, insofar as we have regulated and changed that right by various treaties pertaining to navigation, and principally the treaty of 1909 in reference to the boundary waters.

Now I wish to give my attention to the boundary water treaty of 1909, and I again want to acknowledge my indebtedness to the Mississippi River Valley Association for gathering these data in their brief.

The Rivers and Harbors Act of June 13, 1902, authorized the President of the United States to invite the Government of Great Britain to join in the formation of an international commission, to be composed of 3 members from Canada, and 3 representing the United States, to investigate and report upon the conditions and uses of the boundary waters between the United States and Canada and to make such recommendations for improvements and regulations as best to serve the interests of navigation of said waters. On April 27, 1903, the Canadian Government recommended to the British Government the acceptance of the invitation. The three United States representatives were appointed October 16, 1903, and the Canadian representatives January 7, 1905, and this organization, known as the International Waterways Commission, began the negotiations which resulted in the boundary waters treaty of 1909. This treaty provided for the formation of an International Joint Commission which succeeded the International Waterways Commission.

The International Waterways Commission made extensive and detailed studies of the uses of the waters of the Great Lakes. Its printed reports cover more than 1,200 pages, besides many maps and plates. In 4 of its reports, 2 of which were signed by the whole Commission, 1 of which was signed only by the Canadian section, and 1 signed only by the American members, the allocations of the boundary waters between the two countries, as recommended by this Commission, were very clearly set forth. The allocations as finally written into the treaty were somewhat different from these recommendations but the reason for some of these differences have never been made public.

On March 19, 1906, the United States section of the International Waterways Commission reported to the Secretary of War of the United States:

REPORT OF THE AMERICAN MEMBERS OF THE INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS COMMISSION REGARDING THE PRESERVATION OF NIAGARA FALLS

INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS COMMISSION,
OFFICE OF CHAIRMAN AMERICAN SECTION,
Washington, D.C., March 19, 1906.

SIR: 1. The American members of the International Waterways Commission have the honor to submit for transmittal to Congress this report, * * *

* * * * * * *

23. The Dominion of Canada has granted charters to two corporations in addition to those already mentioned, organized to take water from the Niagara River for power purposes. It has chartered two other corporations, organized to take for power purposes water from Lake Erie, which would naturally be tributary to the Niagara River. These companies have not finally developed their plants, and it is believed that their franchises are therefore not perfected, although all but one are still in force. In one case the charter has expired by limitation. The charters fix no limit to the amount of water which may be used. A charter was granted in 1889 by the Province of Ontario to the Hamilton Cataract, Power, Light & Traction Co. This company is using water from the Lake Erie level of the Welland Canal, which water would otherwise be tributary to the Niagara River. The volume now being used is estimated at about 1,800 cubic feet per second, and is to be increased.

24. The Chicago Drainage Canal, constructed under the authority of the State of Illinois, was designed to divert about 10,000 cubic feet per second of water which would naturally flow over Niagara Falls. It has not been fully completed, but it now has a capacity of about 5,000 cubic feet per second. The amount which it is actually diverting has thus far been limited by the Secretary of War to about 4,200 cubic feet per second. In addition to the foregoing, about 333 cubic feet per second of Lake Erie water is now taken for power purposes from the Erie Canal at Lockport.

26. The total quantity of water to be taken from the river by works now authorized is:

	Cubic feet
Niagara Falls Hydraulic Power & Manufacturing Co	9,500
Niagara Falls Power Co	17,200
Canadian Niagara Power Co	9,500
Ontario Power Co., not including Welland River development	12,000
Electrical Development Co	11,200
Niagara Falls Park Railway Co	1,500

* * * * * * *

32. If the Falls are to be preserved, it must be by mutual agreement between the two countries. As a step in that direction we recommend that legislation be enacted which shall contain the following provisions, viz:

(a) The Secretary of War to be authorized to grant permits for the diversion of 28,500 cubic feet per second, and no more, from the waters naturally tributary to Niagara Falls, distributed as follows:

	Cubic feet
Niagara Falls Hydraulic Power & Manufacturing Co	9,500
Niagara Falls Power Co	8,600
Erie Canal or its tenants (in addition to lock service)	400
Chicago Drainage Canal	10,000

(b) All other diversions of water which is naturally tributary to Niagara Falls to be prohibited, except such as may be required for domestic use or for the service of locks in navigation canals.

(c) Suitable penalties for violation of the law to be prescribed.

(d) The foregoing prohibition to remain in force 2 years, and then to become the permanent law of the land, if, in the meantime, the Canadian Government shall have enacted legislation prohibiting the diversion of water which is naturally tributary to Niagara Falls in excess of 26,000 cubic feet per second, not including the amounts required for domestic use or for the service of locks in navigation canals. It is assumed, however, that an understanding upon this subject would be reached by treaty.

33. The object of such legislation would be to put a stop to the further depletion of the Falls and at the same time inflict the least possible injury upon the important interests now dependent upon this water power. The amount to be diverted on the Canadian side has been fixed with a view to allowing to the companies on that side the amounts for which they now have works under construction, which are:

	Cubic feet
Canadian Niagara Power Co	9,500
Ontario Power Co	12,000

35. The substance of this report was submitted to our Canadian colleagues before the passage of the joint resolution, with a view to uniting in a joint report under the general law providing for the Commission. There was a substantial agreement in the statement of facts, and such differences as developed with respect to the recommendations which ought to be made did not seem insuperable, but our colleagues desired time for further consideration. We have no doubt of their sympathetic interest in carrying out that part of the instructions contained in the resolution which requires us "to exert in conjunction with the members of said commission representing the Dominion of Canada, if practicable, all possible efforts for the preservation of Niagara Falls in their natural condition."

On April 25 the Canadian members of the International Waterways Commission reported to the Minister of Public Works of Canada, and I wish to call attention to a part of their report. After discussing the diversion of water they said:

At Chicago the Americans have built a drainage canal which, when in full operation, will use about 10,000 cubic feet of water per second.

The quantity of water required for the purposes of a ship canal is comparatively small, but the character of this drainage canal at Chicago is such as to involve a continuous flow of water which will have the effect of lowering Lake Michigan by over 6 inches and Lake Erie by 4½ inches. The nature of this work may be judged when we state that the expenditure will be over $40,000,000, and that power works are in course of construction on the canal which will generate some 30,000 horsepower.

As the diversion from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi River is of a much more serious character than the temporary diversions from the Niagara River, it is felt that the amount of water which is to be taken on the American side of the Niagara River should be limited to 18,500 cubic feet per second.

But, in the opinion of your Commission, the preservation of Niagara Falls is a minor matter as compared with the preservation of the interests of navigation on the Great Lakes.

Following that, the Canadian section of the board said:

If our proposal is carried out, the diversions will be about as follows:

Diversions of the American side

	Cu. ft. per sec.
Niagara Falls	18,500
Chicago Drainage Canal	10,000
Total	28,500

Diversions on the Canadian side

	Cu. ft. per sec.
Niagara Falls and on the Niagara Peninsula	36,000

In other words, they got some 8,000 cubic feet per second more power at Niagara Falls than we did, and they took that because they charged us with the diversion of 10,000 cubic feet per second to the Chicago River.

Therefore, this Commission recommends that a treaty be had between the United States and Great Britain, in framing which it should be recognized, that:

* * * * * * *

3. Permanent or complete diversions of such waters are wrong in principle and should hereafter be absolutely prohibited. The diversions by the Chicago Drainage Canal should be limited to the use of not more than 10,000 cubic feet per second.

I shall not read any further from that report. That was the recommendation upon which the treaty was finally concluded. All of the members of the International Waterways Commission joined in the report on May 3, 1906, to the Secretary of War of the United States and the Minister of Public Works of Canada. The joint report is as follows:

The International Waterways Commission has the honor to submit the following report upon the preservation of Niagara Falls:

The Commission has made a thorough investigation of the conditions existing at Niagara Falls, and the two sections have presented reports to their respective Governments setting forth these conditions, to which attention is invited. The following views and recommendations are based upon a careful study of the facts and conditions set forth in these reports:

1. In the opinion of the Commission, it would be a sacrilege to destroy the scenic effect of Niagara Falls.

2. While the Commission are not fully agreed as to the effect of diversions of water from Niagara Falls, all are of the opinion that more than 36,000 cubic feet per second on the Canadian side of the Niagara River or on the Niagara Peninsula and 18,500 cubic feet per second on the American side of the Niagara River, including diversions for power purposes on the Erie Canal, cannot be diverted without injury to Niagara Falls as a whole.

3. The Commission therefore recommend that such diversions, exclusive of water required for domestic use or the service of locks in navigation canals, be limited on the Canadian side to 36,000 cubic feet per second, and on the United States side to 18,500 cubic feet per second (and, in addition thereto, a diversion for sanitary purposes not to exceed 10,000 cubic feet per second be authorized for the Chicago Drainage Canal), and that a treaty or legislation be had limiting these diversions to the quantities mentioned.

That was the joint report of the board. In pursuance of that report, a treaty was entered into.

The last report of all the members of the joint board was made January 4, 1907, to the Secretary of War of the United States and the Minister of Public Works of Canada regarding the Chicago Drainage Canal. I read section 43 of that report—and this, let it be remembered, is the Joint Commission speaking—in which it was said:

43. A careful consideration of all the circumstances leads us to the conclusion that the diversion of 10,000 cubic feet per second through the Chicago River will, with proper treatment of the sewage from areas now sparsely occupied, provide for all the population which will ever be tribuatary to that river, and that the amount named will, therefore, suffice for the sanitary purposes of the city for all time. Incidentally it will provide for the largest navigable waterway from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi River, which has been considered by Congress.

We, therefore, recommend that the Government of the United States prohibit the diversion of more than 10,000 cubic feet per second for the Chicago Drainage Canal.

When this treaty was finally signed by the two Governments and submitted to the Senate for ratification, there were some proceedings in the Senate that may be of interest and may throw some light upon the matter of the diversion at Chicago. In those proceedings Secretary of State Elihu Root gave testimony before the Committee on Foreign Relations. He was asked the following questions by Senator Carter:

On what theory is 36,000 allowed on the Canadian side and 20,000 cubic feet on ours?

Secretary Root replied:

Because the water can be taken out on the Canadian side without interfering. The great bulk of the water goes on the Canadian side, and the Waterways Commission that was appointed some time ago to deal with the question of the lake levels reports, I think, that 36,000 feet can be taken out on the Canadian side and 18,500 on the American side without injury to the Falls. I thought it wise to follow the report of the Commission, and I put in 1,500 feet in addition to get round numbers, so our limit is higher than we want.

Of course, I do not see how the matter of taking water from one side of the river or the other would make any difference, but Secretary Root seemed to think it was a good excuse to do it; but he goes on further, and this is the real reason for it:

There is this further fact why we could not object to this 36,000 provision on the Canadian side. We are now taking 10,000 cubic feet a second out of Lake Michigan at Chicago, and I refused to permit them to say anything in the treaty about it. I would not permit them to say anything about Lake Michigan. I would not have anything in the treaty about it, and under the circumstances I thought I better not kick about this 36,000.

So we are charged by the Canadian Government with 10,000 cubic feet per second taken from Lake Michigan, and we have been paying for it ever since this treaty was signed.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator has quoted the first part of the testimony of Secretary of State Root.

Mr. DIETERICH. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Will the Senator continue reading where he left off? The Secretary explains his reason for this division of water.

Mr. DIETERICH. He explains why Canada should get the better of it. His explanation that water is taken out of one side of the river because it can be taken out there easier than on the other side refutes the theory that water seeks its own level. If the river is accessible, the water can be taken out wherever it is desired to take it out; and it will not make an inch difference in the level of the river whichever side it is taken from. That was an excuse for giving Canada the better of it in the division of water power at Niagara Falls by the 1909 treaty to the extent of 36,000 second-feet as against 18,000 second-feet, and that in the face of the fact that practically two thirds of that water is supplied from United States watersheds.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If that is correct, then Mr. Root's testimony is incorrect.

Mr. DIETERICH. If that is correct, Mr. Root's testimony is a conclusion in which I do not concur.

In the proceedings in the United States Senate, it seems that Secretary Root was invited to appear before the Senate when the treaty was up for ratification; and on January 20, 1909, when the treaty was the subject of consideration, and Mr. Root was sitting in the Senate—I assume to advise—as article V of the treaty was read, Senator McCreary asked the following question of Mr. Root:

What is the reason that we are allowed to divert but 20,000 while Canada is allowed 36,000?

And Secretary Root said:

There are several reasons.

And then, among the reasons that he gave, he said:

In the third place they consented to leave out of this treaty any reference to the drainage canal, and we are now taking 10,000 cubic feet per second for the drainage canal which really comes out of this lake system.

Senator Bacon, of Georgia, then asked Secretary Root another question that is pertinent to this inquiry. He asked:

You think there can never be any international question as to whether the term "tributary waters" includes Lake Michigan? You think it perfectly sure that Lake Michigan is excluded?

This was before the Senate of the United States, remember; and Secretary Root said:

I am perfectly sure of it. Article II of the treaty makes it perfectly certain that Lake Michigan is not to be regarded as a boundary water.

It is all within the United States; and section 5 of the treaty of 1909, for which we are now trying to trade section 8, is as follows:

The high contracting parties agree that it is expedient to limit the diversion of waters from the Niagara River so that the level of Lake Erie and the flow of the stream shall not be appreciably affected. It is the desire of both parties to accomplish this object with the least possible injury to investments which have already been made in the construction of power plants on the United States side of the river under grants of authority from the State of New York, and on the Canadian side of the river under licenses authorized by the Dominion of Canada and the Province of Ontario. So long as this treaty shall remain in force, no diversion of the waters of the Niagara River above the Falls from the natural course and stream thereof shall be permitted except for the purposes and to the extent hereinafter provided.

Continuing further to quote from article V:

The United States may authorize and permit the diversion within the State of New York of the waters of said river above the Falls of Niagara, for power purposes, not exceeding in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 20,000 cubic feet of water per second. The United Kingdom, by the Dominion of Canada, or the Province of Ontario, may authorize and permit the diversion within the Province of Ontario of the waters of said river above the Falls of Niagara, for power purposes, not exceeding in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 36,000 cubic feet of water per second.

Now, mark this:

The prohibitions of this article shall not apply to the diversion of water for sanitary or domestic purposes, or for the service of canals for the purposes of navigation.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator contend that the last paragraph of article V has anything at all to do with Lake Michigan?

Mr. DIETERICH. I do.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will permit me, Lake Michigan was expressly left out of the boundary waters.

Mr. DIETERICH. The treaty lays down the general principle of diversion of boundary waters. It lays down the principle that any country can divert for sanitary and canal purposes whatever waters are necessary.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Boundary waters?

Mr. DIETERICH. Any boundary waters.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. But Lake Michigan was not made part of the boundary waters.

Mr. DIETERICH. Lake Michigan was not made part of the boundary waters; no.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And Lake Michigan is not made a part of the boundary waters under this treaty.

Mr. DIETERICH. It is brought into the Great Lakes system by this treaty, ingeniously bringing it in and internationalizing that particular lake. In other words, we surrender our sovereignty over that lake, at least to the extent of permitting navigation of it, under this treaty.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will permit me—I do not want to interrupt him if he prefers not to be interrupted——

Mr. DIETERICH. No; that is all right.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does not the Senator distinguish between the terms "Great Lakes system" and "boundary waters"?

Mr. DIETERICH. Yes; I distinguish between the terms, but I must confess that I am also conscious of what my senior colleague [Mr. LEWIS] so well presented to the Senate—that ingeniously, step by step, they have invaded our sovereignty with a foresight that bespeaks the statesmanship of Great Britain. Little by little have they driven the wedge in. As this treaty of 1909 did not question our sovereignty and our right to the diversion of 10,000 second-feet of water, by this treaty they want to eradicate that without making one pound of compensation at Niagara Falls. They want to hold that for which they traded us 10,000 second-feet, but they do not want to give us another additional pound there. If that is the Senator's idea of protecting not only the interests of the State of Minnesota but the interests of the United States, then the Senator and I differ on what is proper protection of American interests.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I rose to call attention to the fact that the last paragraph of article V refers exclusively to boundary waters and does not refer to Lake Michigan at all.

Mr. DIETERICH. That is not important, as I view it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Has the Senator the figures showing what proportion or percentage of the waters of Lake Superior is in Canada?

Mr. DIETERICH. I have the percentage—and I will eventually get to it—of the waters of the Great Lakes watershed that find their outlet through the Niagara River.

Mr. TYDINGS. Aside from the watershed, I meant what part of Lake Superior, Lake Huron, Lake Erie, and Lake Ontario is within the Canadian boundaries and what part of those four Lakes is within the boundaries of the United States; and what part of the total water area of the five Lakes, including Lake Michigan, is within the United States boundaries and what part of the water area of the Lakes is in Canada; and what part of the watershed of the United States and Canada contributes to the five Lakes?

Mr. DIETERICH. I have that information, and I will reach it presently.

Now let me present another thing.

Suppose the present treaty is ratified, what will be the effect upon the power distribution at Niagara Falls between the United States and Great Britain, or Canada as representing Great Britain?

If diversions for navigation be omitted from consideration, the total Canadian diversion for power on the Niagara Peninsula is 38,000 cubic feet per second, and the diversion for power of the United States is 20,000 cubic feet per second, or an advantage of 18,000 cubic feet per second in favor of Canada. Although the advantage to Canada is great with the present diversion, the advantage will be even greater when the Welland Canal is opened after 1938, when the Chicago diversion has been reduced to 1,500 cubic feet per second. The volume will approximately be, on Canada's side of the boundary, diversion for power at Niagara 36,000 cubic feet. Welland Canal, 5,000 cubic feet. On the United States side, diversion for power at Niagara, 19,725 cubic feet. The New York Barge Canal, 1,200 cubic feet. So there will be a difference, or an excess of diversion permitted on the Canadian side, of over 20,000 cubic feet.

With the diversion at Chicago soon to be reduced to the ultimate volume of 1,500 cubic feet per second, and with Canada using more than 2,000 cubic feet per second through the Welland Canal for power purposes, it seems reasonable that the waters diverted from Niagara for power should be more nearly equally divided.

I now desire to give the information which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] asked for. There can certainly be no geographical reason for this distribution, since 64 percent of the water surface of the Great Lakes is within the United States and 36 percent in Canada. The areas are: 60,950 square miles in the United States; 34,210 square miles in Canada. Most of the water originates in the United States, the drainage basin area being 178,050 square miles, or 59 percent, in the United States, as against 122,030 square miles, or 41 percent, in Canada.

Another item which gives even greater weight to the contribution of the United States to the water supply of the Great Lakes is the fact that the rainfall is heavier on the United States tributary area than on the Canadian side.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator mean by that remark to imply that the United States is wetter than Canada? [Laughter.]

Mr. DIETERICH. Well, at the present time, yes.

A great deal is said about the litigation affecting the Lakes level, but I prefer to go into that at a later time, except that I now desire to call the attention of the Senate to the decree of January 1925.

Upon appeal to the United States Supreme Court, the decree of Judge Carpenter of June 18, 1923, in favor of the United States in the consolidated suits of 1908 and 1913, was sustained and the decree was affirmed. That was an injunction, started as a friendly suit, to prohibit the withdrawal of a greater amount of water than was authorized or permitted by the Secretary of War, and the contention in that suit was that the Congress did not have the power to delegate to the Secretary of War the right to determine what the amount of withdrawal should be, and it was finally held that the Congress did have that authority and the Secretary had the right to make that determination.

In the decree of January 1925, it provides:

> That the defendant, the sanitary district of Chicago, its board of trustees, officers, agents, attorneys, representatives, employees, and servants, and all other persons acting or claiming, or assuming to act, under its authority, be, and they are hereby, each of them hereby is, enjoined from diverting more than the 4,167 second-feet of water.

And it provided that this decree should go into effect in 60 days without prejudice to any permit that may be issued by the Secretary of War according to law, and that within 60 days, on March 3, 1925, they appeared before the Secretary of War; and the Secretary of War, recognizing the necessity of the withdrawal of this water, issued his permit to divert 8,500 cubic feet per second. That permit continued until 1930.

In 1925 the Wisconsin suit against the State of Illinois was started, and the special master was appointed in 1926, and the final report of the master, November 23, 1927, finds that the permit of March 3, 1925, is valid and effective; that it should not be overridden by judicial action. That is the permit of 8,500 cubic feet per second.

The conclusions are:

> 1. That the complainants present a justiciable controversy.
> 2. That the State of Illinois and the sanitary district of Chicago have no authority to make or continue the diversion in question without the consent of the United States.
> 3. That Congress has power to regulate the diversion; that is, to determine whether and to what extent it should be permitted.
> 4. That Congress has not directly authorized the diversion in question.
> 5. That Congress has conferred authority upon the Secretary of War to regulate the diversion provided he acts in reasonable relation to the purpose of his delegated authority and not arbitrarily.
> 6. That the permit of March 3, 1925, is valid and effective according to its terms, and entire control of the diversion remaining with Congress.

That is all we are asking for, Mr. President.

Here were the recommendations of the decree:

> In the light of these conclusions the bill, in my opinion, should be dismissed. I think, however, that if a situation should develop in which the defendants were seeking to create or continue a withdrawal of water from Lake Michigan without sanction of Congress or the administrative officers acting under its authority, the complainant States have such an interest as would entitle them to bring a bill to restrain such action.

That case was rereferred to the master by the Supreme Court, and in the order of rereference they stated that it was referred—

To determine what diversion, if any, of water from Lake Michigan is necessary for the purpose of maintaining navigation in the Chicago River as a part of the port of Chicago after the sewage disposal works are in full operation.

I did want to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to that.

In his final report Judge Hughes said—I am quoting now from the opinion:

Under the opinion of this Court in the present suits, the question of the allowance for the diversion of water from Lake Michigan in the interests of the waterway to the Mississippi is not deemed to be open to consideration.

So the only question involved in that suit and determined in that suit was the question of the amount of the withdrawal of water in order to maintain navigation in the Chicago River as a part of the port of Chicago, and not as a part of the waterway.

On April 21, 1930, the Supreme Court rendered its final decision, and on July 3, 1930, the Congress passed the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1930, in which they appropriated $7,500,000 to complete the Lakes-to-Gulf waterway link from Lockport to Utica, and they did that in view of the litigation that had preceded, and the act of 1930, provided that as soon as practicable after the Illinois waterway shall have been completed, for which this appropriation was made—

In accordance with this act the Secretary of War shall cause a study to be made of the amount of water that will be required as an annual average flow to meet the needs of a commercially useful waterway as defined in said Senate document, and shall on or before July 31, 1938, report to Congress the results of such study.

That law, Mr. President, was in force, and that waterway was not complete when this treaty was signed by President Hoover and the British authorities, and that was a part of the law of the land at that time, and every officer of the Government was bound to observe it, and the Congress was bound to observe it, and that was absolutely and utterly disregarded, and a treaty consummated that fixed the amount of flow before the canal was even completed. And then, in order that there might be some compliance some 6 months or a year after the treaty has been signed and before its ratification, there is supplied a report purporting to be made under this section of the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1930. The completion of the Illinois Waterway was in June 1933; not until after the present treaty had been signed.

There has been a good deal said about this report that is supposed to be House Document No. 184. I desire to read some excerpts from this report. These are excerpts from a report of the Chief of Engineers to the Secretary of War, dated December 6, 1933, for transmission to Congress under the provisions of the act of July 3, 1930, requiring the Secretary of War to study the needs of diversion from Lake Michigan for a commercially useful Illinois waterway, and to report his findings to Congress on or before January 31, 1938.

And here some 5 years before that report is due, and the 5 years that were given to make a study of this project, in order to make a feigned compliance with the 1930 Rivers and Harbors Act, we find this report. He first comments on what the district engineer says in his report to his chief:

While the district engineer finds—

I am reading from the report now—that an annual diversion of 15,000 cubic feet per second, increased by domestic pumpage, is ample to provide an adequate flow to meet all requirements of lockage, leakage, and evaporation of the waterway, he concludes that the determination whether this flow will provide a flow suitable from a sanitary standpoint for a commercially useful waterway can be made only by experience after the sewage-treatment plants at Chicago are completed.

So the district engineer is not going to let them get him into a ninehole, because anyone who has studied the lower Illinois River knows that such a flow of water will not render it sanitary; that the pools above the dam will become stagnant and unfit for navigation.

Let us see what the division engineer says; let us see whether he had studied the project sufficiently to advise how much water was necessary.

The division engineer concurs in general with the conclusions of the district engineer—

I am reading from a report now which is not in print and is not on the desks of Senators—

He recommends that the Chief of Engineers be granted authority to direct such additional temporary diversion—to direct such additional temporary diversion of the lake waters, not to be considered in the determination of the annual average, as may be necessary to flush the pools and to maintain the pool levels.

Listen to this—

These reports have been referred, in accordance with law, to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. Attention is invited to its report herewith concurring in general with the views and recommendations of the reporting officers.

This is the report of the Board of Engineers on this project. The Board states:

The indirect needs of such a waterway and the matter of securing satisfactory sanitary conditions by those aboard vessels or employed at terminals cannot be determined—

I emphasize "cannot be determined"— until the waterway has been fully completed and the diversion limited to 1,500 cubic feet per second for a sufficient period of time to observe the conditions that may then exist.

Yet in the face of this and in the face of the advice of these engineers we are asked to ratify this treaty.

The report of the Board of Engineers states:

That the Chief of Engineers be granted authority to direct such additional temporary diversion of lake water, not to be considered in the determination of the annual average, as may be necessary to flush pools or to maintain pool levels as may not be inimical to lake navigation.

If this recommendation in the report is to be taken into consideration, why do we not find a reservation offered by the proponents of the treaty carrying out these views?

I quote further from the report:

After consideration of these reports, I concur in general with the view and recommendations of the Board. It does not appear possible to arrive at a conclusion determining whether this flow will afford suitable sanitary conditions on the waterway until after the sewage-purification plants in Chicago have been completed and placed in operation.

So much for the report of the engineers.

An interesting thing in this record is the controversy on lake levels. I have a hydrograph that gives the variation of the lake levels from year to year. It shows that they fluctuate from year to year and from period to period. The natural fluctuation of the lake levels on the Great Lakes, based on the monthly averages from 1860 to 1932, has been as follows:

Lake Superior, 3.98 feet; Lake Michigan, 6.22 feet; Lake Huron, 6.28 feet; Lake Erie, 4.62 feet; Lake Ontario, 5.54 feet.

The natural fluctuations from 1926 to 1929 were—

Lake Superior, 3.35 feet; Lake Michigan, 5.04 feet—that is the average fluctuation from 1926 to 1929, and yet complaint is being made about a project that will reduce the lake levels less than 6 inches—Lake Huron, 4.97 feet; Lake Erie, 4.37 feet; Lake Ontario, 4.44 feet.

The annual fluctuation of Lake Michigan—the difference between high and low water—is 1 foot. So it can be seen how one must draw upon his imagination to conclude that any damage could possibly be occasioned by a reduction of less than 6 inches in the lake levels when in a period of some 4 years Lake Michigan itself has varied in its levels over 4 feet.

Article VIII of the treaty should be eliminated. That article provides that:

The high contracting parties recognizing their common interest in the preservation of the levels of the Great Lakes system, agree:

(a) 1. That the diversion of water from the Great Lakes system, through the Chicago Drainage Canal, shall be reduced by December 31, 1938, to the quantity permitted as of that date by the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States—

Entirely ignoring the Congress and providing that the diversion of water for the purpose indicated shall be determined by a decree in which the question of navigation was not even in issue. Then this treaty provides that in case of an emergency the contracting parties agree to appoint a board of three, one by the United States, one by Canada, and the third selected by the other two, although everyone knows that no country, including Canada and the United States, will ever yield a right or ever consent that an emergency exists when the only question is whether or not there shall be constructed a waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf. The treaty further provides:

(b) That no diversion of water, other than the diversion referred to in paragraph (a) of this article, from the Great Lakes system or from the international section to another watershed shall hereafter be made except by authorization of the International Joint Commission.

That means that the New York waterway as well as the Illinois waterway must be strangled and held down.

That each Government in its own territory shall measure the quantities—

I want the Senate to pay particular attention to this provision:

(c) That each Government in its own territory shall measure the quantities of water which may at any point be diverted from or added to the Great Lakes system, and shall place the said measurements on record with the other Government semi-annually;

(d) That in the event of diversions being made into the Great Lakes system from watersheds lying wholly within the borders of either country, the exclusive rights to the use of waters equivalent in quantity to any waters so diverted shall, notwithstanding the provisions of article IV (a), be vested in the country diverting such waters, and the quantity of water so diverted shall be at all times available to that country for use for power below the point of diversion, so long as it constitutes a part of boundary waters.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will my colleague allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the junior Senator from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to call my colleague's attention to the fact that the provision which he has just read is the only—and I regret my honorable friend the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. PITTMAN] is not now present—is the only instance to be found in treaties that have been negotiated during the last 50 years between the United States and any country of the world where in the treaty itself a provision is dared to be written that any further diversion of water shall not be had except only upon an understanding between three men representing, we will say, Canada and the United States, and by which the United States practically contracts to take away from the United States Senate the right even of considering a treaty, for if Canada succeeds in establishing in this document to her advantage, she can prevent the United States by treaty even to make any change in the diversion, she having gotten an agreement that the only kind of change that can be made in the future can only be made with the consent of the particular representative of her government.

Mr. DIETERICH. I thank my colleague for that suggestion. Furthermore, this is intended to cover another condition that will soon obtain in the Dominion of Canada. They have now, as I understand, practically completed the engineering data whereby a large dam is to be constructed in one of the rivers that flow into Hudson Bay; and, with that in view, they talk of diversion into watersheds. They want to protect themselves in the use of that power not only from the river into the Lakes, but after it reaches the Lakes; and they do that in spite of the fact that two thirds of the territory around the Lakes and their watersheds belong to the United States. When they give one drop of water they want it for themselves. They do not say after the volume of the watershed is equalized that an adjustment shall be made. Oh, no; their diplomats do not act in that way; they protect their own interests better than that.

Then the treaty further provides for the construction of works in the Niagara and St. Clair Rivers to compensate whatever diversion there may be through the Chicago Drainage Canal.

I say that they could very easily, without any interference to navigation, construct compensating works that would compensate for the diversion of 10,000 second-feet as well as for the 1,500 second-feet. There is no question but that Congress has authority to control the diversion of water from one watershed into another when it is done for the public good and for the public interest; there is no reason why we should not leave the Congress of the United States this authority; and if the Congress has not that authority, then the treaty-making power has not that authority.

Mr. President, I do not know that I care to occupy much longer the time of the Senate. About everything has been injected into this argument that ingenuity could suggest to arouse the prejudice of Members of this body. I say that advisedly. We have tried poor John P. Morgan here again. I am not personally acquainted with Mr. Morgan but he has been dragged in here and the argument has been made that we ought to vote to ratify the pending treaty because by so doing we will injure him. I do not know Morgan nor his investments. I assume he is no better and no worse and is entitled to no more rights and no less rights. God knows I am not in his class financially. The railroads have been dragged in here as a great public enemy. The railroads must be destroyed, of course, on the great broad national principle that a little cheaper transportation can be obtained for some commodities which can be raised in some of the Lake States. If that is not narrowing the question down to sectionalism, then I do not understand what sectionalism or prejudice is.

Mr. President, I believe I have presented to the Senate all that I care to submit at this time. I want to reiterate that I resent what was said on the floor of the Senate by the opposition in reference to the position of myself and my colleague being interpreted as against the administration. No Senator in this Chamber has been more faithful and loyal, no one has exercised a more sustained loyalty toward the administration in its great fight for recovery than my colleague the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. No one has worked harder to help bring about that accomplishment. When he is accused of saying something that reflects upon the President of the United States, it is an accusation that is wholly unjust and unfair.

I thank Senators for their attention.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, at this juncture, just as the Senator concludes, I wish to say that any allusion made by him to my efforts and services in behalf of the administration must be added to by saying that his own efforts, his constant services, and his constant votes have been equal in every form of loyalty and service to anything I have contributed.

Mr. McKELLAR obtained the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to enable me to suggest the absence of a quorum and request a roll call?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to have the RECORD show that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are necessarily detained from the Senate, and that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are each detained by illness.

Mr. HEBERT. I wish to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] are necessarily absent from the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me for a brief statement?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Earlier in the day the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] made inquiry as to whether or not it would be agreeable to fix some hour to vote on the pending treaty with regard to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway.

Mr. LEWIS. That is a correct statement.

Mr. PITTMAN. At that time I suggested that personally I am very anxious to have the matter disposed of at the earliest practical time; that a number of reports have been submitted by the President from the various departments giving facts that bear on the questions involved, and that those reports are being printed as rapidly as possible for the benefit of Senators.

I also invited attention to the fact that the reports would contain maps and graphs which it will take time to print, but that I expect they will be ready in a few days; at least I hope that will prove to be the fact.

I also stated that it is evident there are measures of an emergency nature which will be reported to this body very soon, and that under the general custom they have precedence over such matters as the pending treaty. I suggested at that time that I personally would be willing, if the others who are interested in the matter would be willing, to have an agreement to vote on the treaty a week from next Saturday.

What is the viewpoint of the Senator from Illinois now?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, my reply is that I would prefer an earlier vote; but I cannot overlook the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who at the same moment intimated that there are Senators who desire to speak who have not let their desires yet be known, and because of such, knowing their desires, he could not consent to an agreement at this time to vote. Therefore I am compelled to state that until something can be understood as to who shall speak and the length of time they feel they desire, I do not know upon what date we can agree. I am for some date before a week from next Saturday, if it can be so agreed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the courtesy which the Senator from Illinois has shown not only toward the Senator from Nebraska but toward other Senators by desiring that everyone who desires to speak shall have a chance to do so seems rather inconsistent with his present request for an immediate vote.

Mr. LEWIS. It does if it is assumed that all who wish to speak desire to speak as long as those of us who have spoken.

Mr. PITTMAN. Can the Senator suggest any other date that he thinks might accommodate Senators in the circumstances?

Mr. LEWIS. I have not heard an expression of the wishes of other Senators, but I would suggest Wednesday of the following week. All the time between now and Wednesday could be assigned to those Senators, I assume; or, if they should desire something more than that, I take it they could express it in the meantime.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WAGNER. I suggest that we fix 2 o'clock on next Wednesday as the time for voting upon the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. LEWIS. I have already suggested Wednesday, without regard to the hour; but I accept the suggestion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the Senators in charge of the opposition to this treaty and those of us who are for the treaty are very close together. We are certainly very close together in principle. That is, we do not desire to foreclose anyone in the Senate who desires to speak on the treaty. Also, we desire, of course, to let him have an opportunity to see for himself the reports that have been quoted from by the various speakers.

I send to the desk a proposed unanimous-consent agreement and ask to have it read so that we may consider it. I will say that the difference in time is very little.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Nevada proposes the following unanimous-consent agreement:

Ordered by unanimous consent, That after the hour of 12 o'clock on the calendar day of Friday, February 9, 1934, no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 20 minutes upon the pending Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty, nor more than once nor longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered thereto, or upon any reservation that may be pending or that may be offered to the resolution of ratification; that no amendment or reservation shall be formally proposed which shall not have been presented on or before the calendar day of Friday, February 9, 1934; and that on the calendar day of Saturday, February 10, 1934, at not later than the hour of 6 o'clock p.m., the Senate shall proceed to vote without further debate upon all questions arising in the parliamentary disposition of said treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I suggest to the able chairman of the committee that we ought to send a message to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] with regard to the contents of this proposal, as he has indicated his desire to object, unless Senators have some word to the contrary.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I say that my information is that the Senator from Nebraska is willing to agree to this proposal?

Mr. LEWIS. Then that would dispose of my only reservation.

Mr. WAGNER. I shall object unless the date is moved nearer than February 9.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from New York will not object. I desire to say that this morning the Senator from New York and other Senators were urging me to get an early vote on this matter. I have made every effort to get an early vote on it by reason of the fact that I am nominally in charge of the treaty as Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. I told the Senators that I would do what I could.

Now, we have come down to a difference of only a short time. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] this morning objected for the reasons he stated, and which were repeated by the Senator from Illinois. Now, the Senator from Nebraska has waived his objection to voting on Saturday. In view of all the debate that has taken place, in view of what the Senator from Illinois has said with regard to affording an opportunity to every Senator to speak, and what the Senator from Nebraska has said with regard to affording an opportunity to every Senator to speak, it does not seem as if there is a real hearty effort to get a vote on this matter when we now find those who were so earnest in seeking a vote resorting to an objection over a difference of 3 days. The very reason of the delay in the matter was to give every Senator an opportunity to speak if he wanted to, and also to give Senators an opportunity to read the documents that are now being printed, and that perhaps will not be here before Wednesday.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I am so earnest in my desire for a vote that I want to move the date nearer than next Saturday. When I discussed the matter with the Senator this morning, he knows that I suggested Monday as the date for a vote. There is quite a difference between Monday and next Saturday.

I do not want to be obdurate about the matter, but we have a good part of today left; we have all day Friday, Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday, which would be 4½ days for long speeches; and after that I think there might properly be a curtailment of the discussion. So I suggest to the Senator that he move the date back from Friday to Wednesday. That is a fair compromise between what I originally suggested and what the Senator proposes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has made a very able speech on this subject. It was essential for him to take several hours in which to do it.

Mr. WAGNER. The junior Senator from New York has not spoken on the treaty. He is going to do so.

Mr. PITTMAN. Several hours were necessary to enable the senior Senator from Illinois to present the case as he has presented it. His speech was against the treaty. The junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH] has occupied several hours in a very able speech on this subject. Not a minute was wasted. He has stated his case. On the other side of the case, the Senator from Nevada, in opening the debate, occupied only about an hour with his own remarks. While he held the floor for about 2 hours, the debate was general.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] made a comparatively short speech in favor of the treaty. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has made an extensive speech on it.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] gave us two very excellent expositions of the matter from his point of view.

Mr. PITTMAN. Excellent; but when it is recalled that 15 States by legislative action have endorsed this treaty, I think the Senators from those States are entitled to have a chance to speak, and probably will speak, on the subject.

I agree thoroughly with what the senior Senator from Illinois has said—that we do not desire to foreclose anyone. We desire also that Senators shall have an opportunity to study the question. Furthermore, I realize that we cannot afford to delay any of these emergency measures.

In view of all that, and the Senator from Nebraska having withdrawn his objection, it seems to me that if we are given until Saturday to vote on this matter, and then, commencing on Friday, limit the speeches of each Senator to 30 minutes on the treaty and 10 minutes on each proposed amendment or reservation, we will accomplish everything we desire, namely, the earliest possible disposition of the treaty without foreclosing any Senator from speaking.

In view of these circumstances, I certainly hope that the Senator from New York, who has been so anxious for a vote on this matter, will not quibble over the question of 3 days.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WAGNER. There is. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York objects.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in addition to what the Senator from Nevada has said, may I point out to the Senator from New York that it probably will be necessary to consider some legislative matters in the early future, and unless some Senator wishes to speak on the treaty, the plan will be to take up certain legislative measures. For that reason it seems to me that the request of the Senator from Nevada should be acceded to.

I am going to ask my friend, the Senator from New York, to withdraw his objection. Necessarily we have to compromise on these arrangements.

Mr. WAGNER. I suggest, then, as a compromise, that the request be renewed on Monday of next week. In the meantime we can see how much more time is consumed in debate. I desire to address the Senate on this subject, and I am sure the Senator would not want to have me deprived of that opportunity.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I suggest, as a compromise, that we let the matter go over until tomorrow and then renew it?

Mr. WAGNER. Very well.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will that suit the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The matter will go over until tomorrow.

Mr. PITTMAN subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to place in the RECORD a synopsis of speeches, statements, messages, and letters of the President of the United States since 1921 to date, which I think will contradict successfully the charges made 3 days ago by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the charge made yesterday and today by the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], to the effect that the President had been misinformed as to the facts by his advisers in regard to the St. Lawrence waterway project. I said today in a colloquy with the junior Senator from Illinois that, in my opinion, the President of the United States knows more about this subject, from long personal study of it, than does any Senator in this body.

It was also charged by the senior Senator from Illinois in his speech about 3 days ago that the power question had been injected into this debate on the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty for the purpose, as I gathered from his statement, of arousing prejudice. These statements, addresses, and messages of the President of the United States will disclose the fact that he had under consideration the power question, together with the navigation question, from 1929 on to the present time; and, as I have already said, has, in my opinion, given greater consideration and study to this subject and investigated it more thoroughly than has any Senator in this body.

I therefore ask to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks at this point, this synopsis containing the statements, addresses, and messages of the President of the United States bearing directly on the subject that has been debated by the two Senators from Illinois and by other Senators.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOV. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT AND THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER PROJECT FOR THE YEAR 1929

The improvement of the St. Lawrence River for navigation and the development of its immense hydroelectric power resources in the interest primarily of the small consumer were dominant concerns of Franklin D. Roosevelt during his 4 years as Governor of New York.

On the 1st day of January, at the hour of noon, 1929, in the assembly chamber of the State capitol at Albany, Governor Roosevelt was inducted into office. A few minutes later he was delivering his inaugural address, laying particular emphasis in it upon the problem of utilization of the State's natural water-power resources. In the presence of Alfred E. Smith, the retiring Governor, from whom he had inherited the responsibility for pressing this problem to an early solution, he said:

"In the brief time that I have been speaking to you there has run to waste on their paths toward the sea enough power from our rivers to have turned the wheels of a thousand factories, to have lit a million farmers' homes—power which nature has supplied us through the gift of God. It is intolerable that the utilization of this stupendous heritage should be longer delayed by petty squabbles and partisan dispute. Time will not solve the problem; it will be more difficult as time goes on to reach a fair conclusion. It must be solved now.

"I should like to state clearly the outstanding features of the problem itself. First, it is agreed, I think, that the water power of the State should belong to all the people. There was, perhaps, some excuse for careless legislative gift of power sites in the days when it was of no seemingly great importance. There can be no such excuse now. The title to this power must vest forever in the people of this State. No commission—no; not the legislature itself—has any right to give, for any consideration whatever, a single potential kilowatt in virtual perpetuity to any person or corporation whatsoever. The legislature in this matter is but the trustee of the people, and it is their solemn duty to administer such heritage so as most greatly to benefit the whole people. On this point there can be no dispute.

"It is also the duty of our legislative bodies to see that this power, which belongs to all the people, is transformed into usable electrical energy and distributed to them at the lowest possible cost. It is our power; and no inordinate profits must be allowed to those who act as the people's agents in bringing this power to their homes and workshops. If we keep these two fundamental facts before us, half of the problem disappears.

"There remains the technical question as to which of several methods will bring this power to our doors with the least expense. Let me here make clear the three divisions of this technical side of the question.

"First, the construction of the dams, the erection of power houses, and the installation of the turbines necessary to convert the force of the falling water into electricity;

"Second, the construction of many thousands of miles of transmission lines to bring the current so produced to the smaller distributing centers throughout the State; and

"Third, the final distribution of this power into thousands of homes and factories.

"How much of this shall be undertaken by the State, how much of this carried out by properly regulated private enterprises, how much of this by some combination of the two is the practical question that we have before us. And in the consideration of the question I want to warn the people of this State against too hasty assumption that mere regulation by public-service commissions is, in itself, a sure guaranty of protection of the interest of the consumer."

Thus, in this address, Governor Roosevelt laid down the fundamentals of his policy. He was beginning to formulate the policy forecast in his speech of acceptance of the nomination for the governorship made on October 9, 1928, in which he said:

"The time has come for the definite establishment of the principle as a part of our fundamental law that the physical possession and development of State-owned water-power sites shall not pass from the hands of the people of the State."

After several weeks of careful study, Governor Roosevelt sent to the legislature, under date of March 12, 1929, a special message recommending the establishment of a commission to propose a plan of development of water-power resources on the St. Lawrence River. Accompanied by a proposed bill, the message stated concisely the nature of the problem and outlined his proposals for its solution. In this message he said:

"For a generation the need for power for industrial and domestic purposes has been steadily increasing, and during this period the ownership by the people of the State of New York of a vast potential source of energy in their portion of the waters of the St. Lawrence River has received increasing public attention.

"In the past the actual necessity for the development of this potential energy has not been wholly clear, but in more recent times the great preponderance of informed opinion recognizes the immediate need for action.

"The State owns or controls other much smaller water-power rights, but it seems to me best at this time to focus recommendations and public attention on the development of the St. Lawrence River.

"In making use of this potential energy on the St. Lawrence, owned by the people of the State, the objective of the problem is essentially this:

"1. The physical transforming of falling water into electrical current.

"2. The transmission and distribution of this current from the plant where it is developed to the industries and homes of the people of the State.

"As this St. Lawrence power source is the property of the people of the State, we can, I think, all agree to the principle that the actual energy therefrom should be, for all time, under the immediate control of the people of the State and should be transmitted and distributed to the people of the State at the lowest practical cost.

"Let me briefly develop these underlying principles. In the manner of the actual development of the St. Lawrence power, it is not enough that the ultimate title vest in the State. I hope there will be no difficulty in securing agreement that not only title but physical possession of the development should at all times vest in direct representatives of the people.

"At least of equal importance is the problem of transmission and distribution to the ultimate consumer. A mere development of power at a low production cost is insufficient unless at the same time we make certain that it is finally distributed to the ultimate consumer at a fair price, under which no individual or corporation involved in the business of transmitting or distributing will make more than a reasonable profit.

"Right there we are confronted with a double difficulty.

"First arises the question of who should do the transmitting and distributing of the power actually generated by representatives of the people of the State. I follow, I think, the opinion of my distinguished predecessor in saying that because of the complications involved the actual operation of a transmission or a distribution system in this field of activity should, if possible, with safety to the people, be undertaken by private enterprise, and that the State should undertake it only if private enterprise proves that it cannot, or will not, successfully carry out the task.

"In regard to the second point, involving the actual rates to be charged to consumers, we are confronted with what many believe to be ineffectiveness of the present rate-regulating powers of the public-service commission. When this commission was first created, about 25 years ago, the basic purpose was to provide fair rates based on fair return to private capital. It was recognized then that private capital entering the public-utility field would be distinguished from private capital entering wholly private fields of industry, in that the profit to a public-utility company would be limited, and sums earned over and above a fair return would be passed back to the consumer in the form of lower rates.

"Since that time a series of court decisions, especially in the Federal courts, have to a large extent nullified the protection originally intended for the consumer. Originally it was intended that fair earnings should be limited to the actual cash capital invested, but today it is notorious that because of court rulings involving replacement value, going value, so-called 'good-will', return on capital, and allowances for surplus, have made legally possible investment returns of as high as 50 percent or even 100 percent annually on the original investment.

"That is why in trying to treat this whole problem of development, transmission, and distribution of St. Lawrence power as a complete picture in the interests of the people of the State, I have sought a method by which we could avoid the rate regulating powers of the Public Service Commission, tied up as it is at the present time by Federal court rulings. I have, therefore, after consultation with many experts on the subject, come to the conclusion that the representatives or trustees who develop the power can enter into contract with transmitting and distributing companies, under which contracts a fair price to the consumer will be guaranteed, this price to make allowances only for a fair return to the companies on the actual capital invested in the transmitting and distributing of this particular power energy. It is a method which is frankly based on theory of contract rather than the theory of regulation.

"To meet this problem the Federal Power Commission has made special rules for setting up capital investment, limited wholly to actual cash, less property deduction for obsolescence depreciation, and the like. But in the Federal Government these rules are valuable in practice only in case the Government wishes to recapture a plant built under license from the Board. There is, however, no reason why the State of New York should not apply the principle of such rules for the purpose of making contracts for the transmission and distribution of its power. Those who have thoughtfully considered the matter see but one way to protect the consumer and to prevent the exploitation of our water power again; that is, by applying the principle of making the right to have power from the power station depend absolutely on a fixed maximum return on actual investment, with books kept in accordance with rules fixed and agreed upon in advance. This is one of the methods proposed in the House of Representatives for dealing with the Boulder Dam project. It is neither Republican nor Democratic in principle. It is just a sound business method used in the public interest.

"I want to reiterate that the St. Lawrence problem involves not only the actual development of the site or sites, but must be thought through to the legitimate end of guaranteeing to the consumer, after the power has been transmitted and is ready for distribution, a final price based only on a fair return on actual investment.

"Now, as to machinery. I have spent many hours and many days in a study of the mechanics of the problem. I am very certain that we have today in existence sufficient data and facts to justify the elimination of any further study as to mere physical feasibility. I have gone over volumes of carefully gathered information, including a comprehensive physical survey of the suggested site or sites on the St. Lawrence River made by the Frontier Power Co. Everything points to the practicability of building a dam. Furthermore, it is my judgment that no insuperable difficulty lies in the relationship between the State of New York on the one side and the United States Government or the Canadian Government on the other side. To appoint a mere commission to make inquiries would get us nowhere—unless we create a body with authority to make, subject to the approval of the legislature, definite agreements on the basis of a definite, carefully worked out plan.

"In the same way, a mere investigating body could get nowhere with conversations with the representatives of private capital in regard to transmission and distribution of power; whereas a body clothed with authority to negotiate with transmitters, distributors, and bankers, on the basis of a comprehensive and definite plan, stands an excellent chance of accomplishing results.

"I propose, therefore, the creation of a body of five representative citizens, regardless of political considerations, to be known as the "trustees of the water-power resources on the St. Lawrence River." It is my thought that these trustees should be composed of men in whom there is great public confidence, such as former Gov. Charles Evans Hughes and former Gov. Alfred E. Smith.

"In its inception these trustees would constitute a planning and negotiating commission, and would be charged with the duty of reporting a definite plan and a specific contract for the approval of the legislature on January 15, 1930. Before such a plan could go into effect it would require legislative approval. If and when approved by the legislature, the trustees would automatically be charged with the duty of carrying the plan into effect.

"These trustees would examine into the engineering phases of the problem and bring in figures as to the practicability and the cost, and would, of course, secure the aid of the best impartial experts available. They would confer with the various Federal authorities, with the International Joint Commission, and, through proper constitutional channels, with the Government of Canada and its Provinces for the purpose of advising the legislature what definite steps should be taken by treaty, Federal legislation, or otherwise to secure complete cooperation. They would confer with representatives of existing or prospective distributors of electric power for the purpose of arranging by contract for the sale of St. Lawrence power to the ultimate consumer after allowing a fair and reasonable return on actual capital investment.

"In other words, I propose that the trustees should bring in a complete plan for the development of the State's water-power resources on the St. Lawrence and that this plan should conform to a definite statement of two basic principles which I believe to be the policy desired by a great majority of our citizens.

"These two basic principles are:

"(1) The natural water-power sites on the St. Lawrence now owned by the people of the State or hereafter to be recovered, shall remain forever inalienable to the people, and any dams or plants necessary to generate power shall be built, financed, owned, operated, and occupied by the trustees, as the duly constituted instrumentality of the State.

"(2) Power developed therefrom shall be transmitted and distributed, if possible, through the employment of private capital so as to secure adequate distribution throughout the State. This distribution, however, shall secure the lowest rates to consumers compatible with a fair and reasonable return on actual cash investment. The rates, in other words, shall be based on actual cash outlay; that is to say, operating expenses, capital outlay, representing money actually spent in plant investment and working capital, with reasonable allowance for obsolescence and depreciation, and a return on the investment not exceeding the interest actually paid on borrowed money and dividend rates not in excess of current rates on preferred stock, and not to exceed 8 percent on all other cash capital. In other words, the power generated by the agency of the State, called the trustees, shall be sold only on a contract basis which will take into definite consideration all the steps between the sale at the power house and the ultimate sale to the home owner or industrial establishment.

"I want to see something done. I want it done in accordance with sound public policy. I want hydroelectric power developed on the St. Lawrence, but I want the consumers to get the benefit of it when it is developed. They must not be left for their sole protection to existing methods of rate making by public service commissions. Are the business men of this State willing to transmit and distribute this latent water power on a fair return on their investment? If they are satisfied, here is their opportunity. If not, then the State may have to go into the transmission business itself. It cannot on the one hand let this power go to waste nor, on the other, be required to yield to anyone who would aim to exploit the State's resources for inordinate profit.

"We shall soon know whether or not such a contract can be made. If the trustees can make it, and it commends itself to the people of the State, then the legislature and I will approve of it, and we can go ahead. But if no such contract can be made, we shall know the reasons why and protect ourselves accordingly. I want to be in accord with sound business principles. I believe there are enough good business men in this State who see this problem as clearly as I do and will be glad to join with the State in this endeavor. I want to give to business this big opportunity to participate in a public service.

"If these proposals become law, we shall have the opportunity of ascertaining whether or not business and finance will accept this way of developing the State's resources for its industries, its commerce, and its homes. On the one hand is the policy of public ownership and control of our power sites, dams, and power plants, with private operation of transmission lines and distributing systems, allowing a fair return on actual cash capital investment. On the other side is one of two courses, either exploitation by private interests or else public ownership and operation not only of the site, the dam, and the power but of the transmission lines and distribution systems as well.

"Instead of asking an individual member of the senate or the assembly to introduce definite legislation in accordance with this message, I am appending hereto a suggested act carrying out the principles and the plan which I am advocating. I shall, of course, be glad to confer with any of the members or committees of your honorable bodies in regard to what I conceive to be a matter of the utmost importance to this State. I hope you will agree with me that this problem which has been so much discussed is now ripe for some form of definite action and that it is great enough to take it wholly away from the field of partisan politics."

The legislature, both houses of which were controlled by the opposite political party, failed to take action upon the proposed measure. Thereupon, on March 26, 1929, Governor Roosevelt sent a second special message calling for immediate action on his proposals. In this message he said:

"On March 12 last I transmitted to your honorable bodies a message on water power, with proposed legislation to carry out the recommendations of that message. I proposed therein the creation of a body of five representative citizens, regardless of political affiliations, to be known as the "trustees" of the water-power resources on the St. Lawrence River, and that these trustees should constitute a planning and negotiating committee charged with the duty of reporting a definite plan and specific contract for the approval of the legislature on January 15, 1930.

"Two weeks have now elapsed and there has been no action in regard to these recommendations by your honorable bodies. I must submit that some action should be taken for the development of these great water-power potentialities before the final adjournment of the legislature. I again urge upon your honorable bodies that you give consideration to my recommendations."

The 1929 session of the legislature ended without any action having been taken on this question. Although Governor Roosevelt had submitted the proposed legislation to carry out the plan, the Republican majority leaders of the legislature refused to introduce the bills and they were accordingly introduced by the Democratic minority leaders. The Republican leaders declined to permit the bills to be reported by the legislative committees for consideration by the legislature itself. Accordingly, Governor Roosevelt's party leaders moved to discharge the committees from further consideration so that the individual legislators might have an opportunity to express themselves on the matter. These motions were defeated by the Republican majority in both houses and the bills were thus allowed by them to die in committee.

Soon after the adjournment of the legislature, Governor Roosevelt in the first of a series of radio messages with which the people of New York, and later those of the entire Nation, were to become familiar, reported on the results of the legislative session. In this address, delivered on April 3, 1929, he discussed the St. Lawrence question in the following language:

"One of the major problems which is still confronting the State is the development of the valuable State-owned water-power resources. This issue has been in the forefront in several State campaigns. There have been differences of opinion as to the course which this development should take, but on one point nearly everyone is agreed, and that is that the ownership of these water-power sites should forever remain in the people of the State and that the electricity generated at these sites should be available for the use of all the people and for the development of our State industries at the lowest fair cost. The Republican platform declared for 'sound policies in the development of water power which will adequately protect the consumer.' Not a single move was made by the writers of the platform to put forward any program, sound or unsound, of water-power development, in this session of the legislature. The Republican majority seem to have lost all interest in this subject. In keeping with my pre-election promises, however, I submitted to the legislature a program which I believed to be a solution of this problem. The Republican leaders in the legislature put through a resolution for adjournment without even considering it."

Less than 2 weeks later Governor Roosevelt again reverted to the failure of his proposals for water-power development to pass the legislature. Speaking over the radio on April 10, 1929, he said:

"Having thanked the Republican leaders for their cooperation with me in my program and helping me achieve more for agriculture than has been done in the past 10 years, I am afraid I will have to lay on their doorstep the blame for the utter failure to do anything about the water power of our State, which has been one of the most important subjects demanding the attention of the legislature for years past. I will not go into the details of my vain attempt to get something done at this session, as I will speak about it many times in the future. Not only was the plan which I proposed, after many conferences with those best qualified to judge of what was a practical way to utilize our water-power resources and still retain the ownership and the control in the State and secure electricity at the lowest possible cost for our people, strangled in committee by the Republican leaders, but no attempt of any kind was made on their part to introduce any legislation on the subject whatever, and this in spite of their own platform.

"I trust before the legislature meets again the people of the State will have made their opinion of this cynical indifference to their demands for a constructive water-power development program so clear as to assure action in 1930."

During the summer of 1929 Governor Roosevelt made a detailed inspection of the St. Lawrence River, particularly in the international section, and conferred with Canadian and American authorities on the proper means of development of both power and navigation.

GOV. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT AND THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER PROJECT FOR THE YEAR 1930

On the 1st day of January 1930 Governor Roosevelt, beginning the second year of his term, delivered his annual message to the legislature, renewing his proposal for the development of the St. Lawrence in the following language:

"Last year after much study I made to the legislature a definite proposal for the long-delayed development of the State-owned water power of the St. Lawrence River. This was deliberately pigeonholed.

"I now renew my recommendation of last year. It was based on a simple declaration of principle—that the ownership, development, and operation of the St. Lawrence power resources remain forever in the actual possession of the people of the State or of an agency created by them, and that the electricity so generated be sold to distributors by contract upon a basis to insure a fair and reasonable rate to the consumer, especially the household user.

"At the same time I thought it advisable that the State agency should at least provide the financing of and retain the fee to any system of State-wide transmission of electricity made necessary by the new power development. As a mere matter of saving in interest rates alone this would reduce the cost of electricity many millions of dollars each year, for the consumer, of course, pays the interest and dividend charges on the project.

"Let us stop once and for all the silly talk that the electricity available by developing the St. Lawrence is not needed or not usable in a practical way. We know that private companies are only too eager to proceed if the State were to abandon its rights.

"Let us establish the policy, and ask the proposed trustees to submit to the next legislature a practical plan based on that policy. If they find a plan and it commends itself to the legislature, let them proceed full steam ahead.

"It is becoming more and more clear, that the families of this State, whether they live in the cities, in the villages, or on the farms, have been paying too much for their electricity, and are therefore not in a position to use to a proper degree the many labor-saving devices of modern invention. Furthermore, rates between different localities show much too great variance, and rural installations are in many cases prohibitive.

"Whether mere regulation of electric utilities in the future can be made more successful than it has proved in the past remains a serious question. In the meantime the development of the great State-owned natural resources offers a definite method of relief."

During the first few days of this session of the legislature the Republican majority leaders introduced bills, similar in intent and scope to those proposed in the preceding year by Governor Roosevelt, to declare the policy of the State with regard to the St. Lawrence resources and to set up a commission to propose a plan for development.

The following day Governor Roosevelt issued a statement hailing the opportunity for reaching a settlement on this contested question. In this statement, dated January 14, 1930, he said:

"I hope and believe that yesterday will go down into the history of our State as a red-letter day. The water power bill introduced in the legislature, while requiring certain changes to clarify it, is of such outstanding importance that every man, woman, and child in the State who uses electricity has cause to rejoice.

"The bill ends a controversy over a great principle which began more than 20 years ago and has been acutely argued during each 1 of the past 10 years.

"The bill introduced last night is of far greater importance than merely the removal of this great subject from the field of temporary politics, for it represents a definite approval of what the majority of people in this State have been striving for regardless of party lines—a sincere effort on the part of the State to develop, through a State agency, the great electric power of the St. Lawrence River.

"On the one side, a powerful group has insisted that the State-owned water power be developed by private corporations or leased to them for generations, relying for protection of the public consumers wholly on public-service commission regulation. On the other side, what is, I believe, an overwhelming public sentiment has insisted that the State retain constant control of its great electric-power resources, develop it, and sell the electricity by contract, in such a way that the consuming public will be assured of cheap lighting and power.

"The issue has been beclouded and befogged from time to time by efforts to magnify mere details and to take away public interest by the cry of 'politics', and the seeking of partisan advantage. In spite of this the big principle has remained the same and a deadlock has existed between what has been clearly and definitely two schools of thought.

"Now, at last, the deadlock is broken. Last night's bill is a definite recognition of the principle for which my school of thought has striven so long.

"I had asked for practical legislation, on broad lines, as follows:

"1. The creation of a board of trustees to bring in a plan. This is given by the bill with the change of the word 'trustees' to 'commissioners.'

"2. These trustees (or commissioners) to bring in a plan for development of the St. Lawrence by a State agency. This is directed by the bill.

"3. The sale of electricity for consumers' use by the contract method. This is directed by the bill.

"4. A report on this plan to the legislature for approval or rejection. This is directed by the bill.

"5. If accepted by the legislature, the creation of permanent trustees to carry out the plan. This is completely set up by the bill.

"I am feeling very happy that the great principles involved are recognized by this proposed legislation, and if it is passed by the legislature I shall, of course, do everything in my power to further the practical working out of a plan based on the principle.

"Let me repeat that the furtherance of the fundamental principle involved marks the greatest step forward which has been taken by any State in the Union in the solution of the much-controverted power problem. It will mark a wholly new phase of the providing of electricity to the homes of the people at low rates."

Governor Roosevelt, attending a dinner of the State Bar Association in New York City on January 18, 1930, devoted his entire address to a thorough discussion of the proposed legislation and a detailed recital of the conflict of principle which had prevented the formulation of a comprehensive water-power policy. He said:

"I want to outline to you tonight a subject which, on its face, is not confined to the interest of the legal profession. You, however, with the other citizens of the State, have read of the proposal made a few days ago by legislative leaders which makes possible the termination of a 10-year deadlock on the subject of the development of State-owned water power.

"That the future of the great public utility known as electricity must be of some interest to the legal profession may be illustrated by an experience I had last year in seeking to find an appointee to the public service commission from a certain district in this State.

"In evolving a list of names of approximately 50 lawyers of real standing in their profession in this district, I came, on investigation, to the discovery that every one of these gentlemen was in some shape, manner, or form the legal representative of some utility company or some utility interest. I do not mention this as being derogatory to the fitness of the lawyers as a whole to represent the public interest in this particular field, but merely as an illustration of the fact that the legal profession is very much concerned with the general problems of the development of utilities.

"It is interesting also that during the past 5 days I have discussed with at least 100 people the new proposal for the development of the St. Lawrence power and only one of these individuals had even read the proposed law. All of the other 99 had based their opinions either on the statements of political leaders or on the accounts which they had read in the public press.

"May I, therefore, present to you as a 'brief' a short account of just what has happened in the past and just what is proposed for the future?

"More than 20 years ago certain far-seeing gentlemen applied to the legislature for a State franchise to develop the water power on the St. Lawrence River in what is known as the 'international section' at the Long Sault Rapids. That these gentlemen asked for a legislative charter was proof conclusive that the State has a very definite interest in the property. This charter was granted by the legislature, but a few years later, with the growing knowledge of what the legislature had given away without compensation to the State, another legislature repealed the charter and every right that it conferred.

"For a number of years there was no open effort on the part of private companies or of the State to develop the latent water power of the St. Lawrence. Gradually, however, an issue was joined between two schools of economic and social thought, the one holding that the development of electricity should be undertaken wholly by private capital, the other holding that this great natural resource was of such tremendous importance to the future population of the State that its constant control should never pass from the hands of the State.

"The next step was the passage of a water power act by which certain State officials were given the right to lease the State power properties, and very soon an application was made by the Frontier Power Co. for a lease of the St. Lawrence rights for a term of 50 years. This in itself seemed to be in the nature of a compromise offer by those who had hitherto been willing to have the State actually sell its rights. This school was willing to admit that the ultimate fee of the title should remain in the State but at the same time insisted that the fee could be leased for long periods of time extending into the dim, distant future. As you all know, the effort to obtain this long-term lease was blocked by my predecessor not only on the technical ground that the lease actually proposed was illegal but on the broader ground that it was contrary to a sound public policy.

"For a number of years the two schools of thought remained at complete loggerheads. One, represented by the Republican Party and Republican platforms, was willing to grant leases for all of the State's rights and properties for long periods though admitting that the nominal ownership should rest in the State. The other school of thought, represented by the Democratic Party and its platforms, asked for the actual physical development of the electrical energy on the St. Lawrence through a State agency and the retaining of the physical manufacture of electricity, and possibly its transmission, in the hands of the State agency at all times. This was the situation when I took office a year ago.

"The next step, and the one which has brought the question finally to a head, was the definite proposal of a law which I submitted in March to the legislature of 1929.

"The principles of this plan can best be explained by comparing its purpose with the bill introduced last Monday in the legislature of 1930. By so doing we can arrive at a wholly fair estimate of what the new legislative offer actually is.

"1. The title of the new bill is in itself important, for it is called, 'An act to declare the policy of the State in respect to its water-power resources, and to provide for the appointment by the Governor of a commission.'

"Please note that the title itself sets up a policy.

"2. Section 1 of the bill is in very definite terms the enunciation of the policy called for by the title to the act, and because it uses the identical language, word for word, with the language of my bill of 1929, I hope that every citizen of this State will read it. It is as follows:

"The natural water-power sites in, upon, or adjacent to the St. Lawrence River, owned or controlled by the people, or which may hereafter be recovered by them or come within their ownership and control, shall remain inalienable to, and ownership and control shall remain always vested in the people."

"It is a simple fact that this key clause has been incorporated in identical language without the changing of a letter or a syllable taken directly from my bill of last year. In this fact lies the justification for the simple, unequivocal statement that this new bill of 1930 is a complete conversion to my policy on the part of the legislative leaders, and is an acceptance of the principle for which I have fought so long.

"3. The new bill in section 2 directs the Governor to appoint five commissioners to bring in a plan or plans. It calls these five gentlemen 'commissioners' instead of 'trustees' as I had suggested, and removes the requirement of the consent of the Senate to their appointment.

"4. The third section of the new bill covers the scope of the inquiry and is in purpose and language substantially similar to the corresponding part of last year's bill. This section has the addition of a new sentence which states that in the event that the commissioners determine that the development by the State, through a State agency, is not feasible or practicable, they shall determine whether an alternative for development or distribution of power would be more beneficial, and shall report such an alternative plan. It is, of course, obvious to any reasonable person that I could have no objection to this sentence, for, as a matter of fact, there was nothing to have prevented the commissioners suggested under my plan last year from stating perfectly frankly that they could not bring in a feasible State agency plan, or from suggesting an alternative plan or plans.

"5. The fourth section of the new bill relates to a technical superseding of prior provisions of law and is identical in language with last year's bill.

"6. The fifth section of the new bill is identical with my bill of last year, except that it appropriates $200,000 instead of $100,000.

"7. The next four sections of the new bill are of the utmost importance because they bear directly on the declaration of policy in the first section of the bill. These last four sections constitute a tentative setting up of an instrumentality of the State, a body corporate and politic to be known as the 'trustees of the water-power resources on the St. Lawrence River.'

"In my bill the language set up this State agency immediately, but my bill provided, of course, that any actual work of electrical development by this State agency should be dependent upon ratification by the following legislature of any plan proposed. In other words, I set up the agency but made it impossible for them to start any construction work until the legislature had given its approval. The new bill merely puts this in different language, saying:

"'If a development by a State authority is recommended in a plan which is approved by the legislature, it shall be a corporate municipal instrumentality of the State known as the trustees of the water-power resources on the St. Lawrence River.'

"From there on, the new bill is identical in principle and practically identical in language with the bill of last year, conferring upon the proposed trustees of the water-power resources the essential duty, rights, and legal authority to carry on their work of actual engineering, construction, financing, and sale of power.

"It is true that the new bill omits a number of sections of last year's bill which were intended to clarify and simplify the work of the proposed commissioners and make their task more simple. Most of the provisions which have been omitted relate to details, but I call your attention at this time to the omission of one declaration of purpose which I believe to be of importance and which I see no reason to leave out in any statement of policy. I refer to the following paragraph of last year's bill which has been omitted this year. It reads as follows:

"'The development of the said power sites and the generation, transmission, and distribution of power therefrom shall be made in such manner and on such terms as to assure fair and impartial treatment of all consumers at the lowest rates compatible with a fair and reasonable return on the actual cost thereof.'

"Let the people of this State read and reread that paragraph. I hope they will. Let them ask the simple question: Does that paragraph state fairly and clearly the purpose of the development of the State's electrical resources? Why it was omitted I do not know. I am certain that the people of this State will agree with me that this paragraph should be put back into the present bill, for it carries with it a simple truth, a simple expectation, and a clear direction to the commissioners that the power must be developed primarily for the good of the consumers and at fair and impartial rates. It will be difficult for any person to defend the omission of this simple statement from any bill.

"I shall be interested in knowing what valid reason can possibly be advanced for the omission of this important principle.

"Such is the summary of the language and the principles of the new bill which opens a new era for the industries and the homes of the people of the State of New York. Let me briefly recapitulate:

"First. The bill accepts, word for word, the same paragraph of State policy which I asked for last year.

"Second. The bill creates a body of five citizens whose primary duty shall be to bring in a workable plan based on that policy.

"Third. The bill sets up a permanent State agency which will begin to function in the actual work of the development of electrical power just as soon as a succeeding legislature has approved of the plan submitted.

"This does not differ in any essential of basic principle from what so many citizens of the State have demanded in the past.

"The important duty of every citizen of the State—lawyers, business men, the press, the agricultural interests, and the average 'man in the street'—is from now on to work whole-heartedly for the carrying out of the proposed policy and the plan which, I am confident, will result therefrom. This is not the time for us to pay heed to carping objections as to detail; to monkey wrenches which some people may try to throw into the machinery; to the magnifying of difficulties which can be surmounted if we have the will to surmount them. I am confident that the great majority of citizens of the State want to see something done, believe that it is practicable to work out a State agency method of development of our great natural electrical resources in such a way that the control of these resources will never pass from the ownership of the State itself."

In a radio address from Albany, delivered on February 3, 1930, Governor Roosevelt continued to arouse popular interest in the pending water power bill. In this speech he said:

"Since the legislature met on January 1, two very important matters which affect most of the homes of the State, whether they be in cities or in country districts, have developed. The first is the offer on the part of the Republican legislative leaders to pass a measure which I hope will prove the first step in the development of the State-owned potential electric power on the St. Lawrence River. The proposed bill authorizes me to appoint a commission of five members who will be charged with the duty of trying to bring in a plan based on the development of this electric power by a State agency or trustees. The bill provides for the setting up of public trustees to carry out the work, if and when a plan is brought in next winter and approved by the next legislature. The bill also recognizes the principle of selling the electricity when developed by contract rather than allowing it to be distributed by electric-light companies under the old system of mere regulation by the public service commission. I hope that this is the first step in obtaining a definite reduction of rates, especially for the householders of this State. The monthly electric-light bill in the average home is becoming a more and more important item in the household expenses and it is incumbent on all of us to see that the rates are kept down to the lowest possible level, in order that we may encourage the use in the average family of more and more electric labor-saving devices. We are, for instance, far behind our neighbors in Ontario in the use of household electricity for a multiplicity of purposes."

It will be of interest to note that Governor Roosevelt was fully aware during this entire period, of the necessity of making adequate provision for deeper navigation facilities in the river.

In letters to the sponsors of the bills in both houses of the legislature, dated February 11, 1930, Governor Roosevelt made what he termed "a personal suggestion" for clarifying the proposed legislation. He wrote:

"There is no clause in the bill relating to the broad objective of the development of the St. Lawrence resources. Last year one of the bills contained the following clause:

"'The development of the said power sites and the generation, transmission, and distribution of power therefrom shall be made in such manner and on such terms as to assure fair and impartial treatment of all consumers at the lowest rates compatible with a fair and reasonable return on the actual cost thereof.'

"It seems to me that something along this line would be a very good thing to add to the present bill.

"Furthermore, I am told that in taking up the question with the Federal authorities, the proposed commissioners would be greatly helped if there could be some clause in the bill stating that any plan for the power development on the St. Lawrence should provide for all present or future navigational uses of the river."

As a result of this suggestion, the bills were amended in such a way as to make certain that due consideration would be given to the navigation features in any improvement of the St. Lawrence.

Finally, after many exchanges of opinion and conferences between the Governor and the legislative leaders of both parties, and forthright appeals to public opinion on the part of the Governor, the legislature passed the St. Lawrence bill on March 25, 1930.

On the following night in a radio address from Albany, Governor Roosevelt made the following references to the passage of the bill:

"Yesterday, I am glad to say, that the bill which I consider may in the future be the outstanding accomplishment of this legislature, was passed. This is the bill to take the first step toward the development of the State-owned electric power resources of the St. Lawrence River. When the smoke and dust of partisan speeches clear away, the people of this State will realize a simple fact.

"This fact is that the legislature has after many years of delay, opposition, and muddying of the waters authorized the Governor to appoint five commissioners or trustees who are charged with the primary duty of trying to bring in a definite plan based on a definite policy. The policy is that a direct agency of the State, to be known as the 'Trustees of the St. Lawrence Water Power,' shall build a dam, generate the electricity, and see that it is sold to the consumer at the lowest possible rate. That is the plain English of the policy, and within the next few weeks I shall appoint the five commissioners. I certainly hope and am very confident that their efforts during this summer and autumn will result in a practical plan under this policy, so that at least the people will get cheaper electric light and power in their homes."

Governor Roosevelt signed the bills on March 29, 1930, 4 days after its passage, and on this occasion he again set forth in the most concise fashion the principles at stake, reviewing also the long struggle of the people to retain control of the great natural resources which belonged to them.

This statement and review, which immediately attracted widespread attention, was as follows:

"The power of public opinion once aroused was never better exemplified than by the final passage of the so-called 'Water Power Commission Act' which I have just had the pleasure and honor of signing. It is a milestone marking the end of a 20-year struggle against great odds, for it takes the first step toward securing cheaper electric light and power. But like all milestones on the road to progress, it is a milestone only and not a terminal. Even greater vigilance will be required on the part of the public to make sure that this progress is not halted by those who have so long successfully blocked all attempts to give back to the people the water power which is theirs. In this bill we have started a right policy and a right outlook toward the use of the vast electrical resources of the St. Lawrence.

"So long as men used our waterfalls and streams only to grind their neighbors' corn or to turn the wheels of primitive manufactures, the public at large had no particular interest beyond seeing that the rights in the running water of one individual or one manufacturer were not interfered with by other individuals or other manufacturers. It was purely a question of the protection of individual rights in which the public generally had no immediate interest. With the sudden development of this new giant, electricity, however, the situation was entirely changed. It is no longer a case of mills along the river banks but of light and power which can be carried along a slender wire into the homes of every citizen. The creation and distribution of this new energy becomes a matter of vital importance to everyone of us. This change in conditions came about very swiftly, in fact, before we had time to think very clearly what to do about it, and we have been operating under laws and theories of ownership devised to meet the old grist mill on the creek conditions. Quick-witted people took advantage of this to secure a virtual monopoly of many of our great natural water-power resources and, except for the Niagara Gorge, the only single unit of major importance still awaiting development, lies in a single stretch of turbulent water along the St. Lawrence Rapids.

"The people of this State owe a debt of gratitude to Governor Smith as the first executive to see what had been quietly going on and to sound the first note of warning. An attempt to secure for their personal advantage this St. Lawrence power under a lease so long as almost to assure that eventually it would become perpetual, was defeated by him with courage and firmness after a struggle which aroused the entire State to the necessity of preventing similar attempts.

"It has been my good fortune to carry this fight one step further. My predecessor stopped the progress of water-power development for private gain. I hope I have been of some assistance in directing this progress along lines of perpetual public ownership and development of that electricity under conditions which will insure the cheapest possible light and power.

"The history of this long struggle is well known. Twenty years ago a State franchise was requested to develop water power on the St. Lawrence at the Long Sault Rapids. The applicants were astute enough to realize that this was, after all, the State's water power and that they must obtain a charter from the State before proceeding further. This charter was granted, but a sudden awakening on the part of the people to the fact that they had sold their birthright, or rather given it away, as no compensation whatever was offered, resulted in the charter being repealed a few years later. The growing belief on the part of the people that the constant control of this power should never pass from the hands of the State as opposed to those who insisted that the development of electricity was entirely a matter of private capital, blocked an attempt 20 years later to obtain the 50-year lease asked for by the Frontier Power Co. Under a Democratic Governor, the party which he represented became the champions for State control and eventually the actual physical development of State water power. A few powerful leaders in the Republican party lined up that organization, at least so far as the legislature was concerned, in favor of granting practically perpetual leases of the State's rights conceding only that nominal ownership should rest in the State. When I assumed office there was apparently a hopeless deadlock on this vital question which made all development progress impossible. Last year, I first submitted a policy which is practically embodied in the act which I have just signed. It remained, however, for this year's legislature to become finally convinced that public opinion demanded that this policy should be adopted. I am grateful, and the people of the entire State should be equally grateful, to the legislative majority leaders for thus finally acquiescing in the demands of the people of the State.

"What this bill actually does cannot be better summarized than in the title which is given in the act itself. This reads:

"'An act to declare the policy of the State in repect to its water-power resources, to provide for the appointment by the Governor of a commission to devise and report a plan or plans for the development of hydroelectric power on the St. Lawrence River and to effectuate such plan or plans when so reported and approved by the legislature and making an appropriation for the purposes of the act.'

"First of all, it declares a policy in respect of the water-power resources on the St. Lawrence still owned or controlled by the people, or which may be hereafter recovered by them. These sites, it is declared, 'shall remain inalienable to and ownership and control shall remain always vested in the people.' Five commissioners are next appointed to study and report plans for the developments and a form of contract for the sale of hydroelectric power developed at the St. Lawrence site. The broadest powers are given this board and the sum of $200,000 is appropriated in order that they may study with the aid of the best engineering advice possible the practical problems as well as financial and legal questions. They are to bring in before January 15 not only a comprehensive plan for the development and operation of the water-power resources of the State on the St. Lawrence by the trustees themselves, but also tentative forms of contracts containing the terms and conditions upon which they find it practical and feasible to sell the power, whether for machinery or for lighting, to be generated from such development. The plan is not to be a theory but a practical method of going about it, including financing and the cost not only of construction but the operation of State power houses. They must also include a plan by which this power is to be sold, and they are not limited as to whether this shall be sold to private companies, to municipalities, or directly to consumers. That is a question for them to determine. Only if after the fullest and fairest investigation they find such technical objections as to make the manufacture or distribution of power by the State not possible or practicable shall they then turn to the consideration of any other method of translating the State's water power into electrical energy. If they find—and I feel certain that they will find—a proper plan based on this policy, and if the legislature—and in selecting future legislatures this must never be forgotten—is in sympathy with the policy now declared to be the policy of the State and find their plan practicable, trustees, as a body corporate, perpetual in duration, under the title of trustees of the water-power resources of the St. Lawrence, are then to proceed at once with full authority to put the plan into effect. For this purpose they are given the broadest and fullest powers of construction, condemnation, and operation, not only of power houses but of any other instrumentalities or the things incidental to or connected with the development and sale of hydroelectric power at the site over which it has jurisdiction, and generally to make contracts and do such things as may be necessary and convenient to carry out the purposes of the act. But one restriction is laid upon them, and this is a most important one, because it declares the general policy of the State. This restriction reads as follows: 'Provided that the natural water-power resources of the State held or controlled by the trustees and the property incidental to the development and operation thereof held or controlled by them shall remain forever inalienable as property held in trust by the State to be owned and controlled solely by the State or a public agency thereof.'

"All this is now a law of the State of New York. We have started along the right way."

After the close of the legislative session of 1930, Governor Roosevelt, in a radio address on April 12, 1930, referred to the problem of water-power development as follows:

"Likewise, after many years of unceasing efforts the people have at last won assurance that the State-owned electric power resources on the St. Lawrence will be developed by the State in the interest of all the people. Here again, public development of water power was blocked by selfish interests which dominated the other party until the people as a whole became so insistent the legislature was forced to recognize their voice. As a result, I am shortly to appoint a commission which will prepare a plan for public development for submission to the next legislature."

On the same day Governor Roosevelt, reviewing the record of the legislative session, cited the following:

"The 20-year struggle for the development of the St. Lawrence, with the objective of cheap electricity for our homes, resulted in a complete victory for this great fundamental principle."

In another radio address from Albany on April 23, 1930, devoted to a discussion of public utilities, Governor Roosevelt said:

"When history is written the legislature of 1930 will always be remembered as having taken one great step and opened the door toward another great step.

"The first was the passage of the law authorizing me to appoint a commission to use every effort to bring in a plan for the development of our electrical resources on the St. Lawrence under a State agency, rather than by a private corporation. I have spoken several times before of the details of and reasons for this important State policy, and I refer to it tonight only because it has a somewhat close bearing on the general subject of cheaper electric light in our homes, and I hope that you will bear the fact of the St. Lawrence policy in mind when you discuss the even broader subject of the State's general policy toward what is known as public utilities."

In this same address Governor Roosevelt touched on the necessity for legislation giving municipalities the right to set up a yardstick in the electrical field through the medium of municipally owned and operated utility services. In this connection he said:

"There are two methods of restoring reasonable rates for electricity and telephones in this State, and I say advisedly that I consider the rates charged to householders for these commodities are today too high. Unless we act definitely and promptly they are going even higher. One of these methods is to allow and restore competition either by encouraging new companies to enter the field or by setting up at least as a yardstick more municipally operated companies, especially in the electrical field.

"I think it is an established fact that those municipalities in the United States which have their own municipally owned companies providing the light and power for their citizens give just as good service and much lower rates than in almost any of the privately owned companies. The yardstick of municipal operation is the question of success. Almost all of the municipally owned companies are successful today, and the yardstick which they have furnished us proves that the rates of most of the privately owned electric companies are too high."

In an address before the Democratic State committee in Albany on June 17, 1930, Governor Roosevelt said:

"First, on the subject of water power, an economic and political contest lasting 20 long years has terminated in a way which I am confident will bring tangible benefits to every household throughout the State of New York in the years to come. The principal of State development of State-owned resources for the primary benefit of the consuming public has at last been acceded to by the legislature. There is no doubt in my mind that the people of this State understand and will continue to support this basic principle which will prevent private exploitation of public property. The soundness of the Democratic position maintained year after year at last has been accepted."

Governor Roosevelt was renominated in September 1930 and in his acceptance speech at the National Democratic Club in New York City on October 3, 1930, he referred to certain points in his speech of acceptance 2 years earlier, in the following language:

"I advocated a definite program for the development of the vast water-power resources of the State under constant governmental control and possession. The capitulation of the Republican leaders in response to public pressure is still fresh in our minds. One of the great issues this autumn is whether this great policy shall be maintained and carried through or whether the State will revert, either openly or by hidden means, to private ownership."

The campaign for re-election led Governor Roosevelt to many utterances with regard to the St. Lawrence water-power problem. In a radio address at Albany on October 13, 1930, he was discussing the record of the opposing candidate for the governorship and said:

"There is another subject on which that gentleman is also silent and apparently intends to remain so, even though last week he was speaking in the counties that adjoin the great water powers of the St. Lawrence River. I refer to that household necessity which is used by a great majority of people in the State—electricity in the home.

"People who are rich or moderately well off think of their monthly electric-light bill as a comparatively small item against their total income. People who pay ten or fifteen or twenty dollars a month for their electric light are not greatly concerned with the question of rates, but, on the other hand, people who have to think about the pennies are very much concerned as to whether their electric light costs a dollar a month or $5 a month, for the difference of $4 a month amounts to $48 a year. Let us not forget the fact that at least 90 percent of the people in this State have to think about the pennies. Remember it is less than 10 percent of our people who do not have to bother about the size of milk, electricity, and telephone bills. In which class do you belong?

"Therein lies the great fundamental question as to whether in the matter of electricity the 90 percent of users in this State are paying a reasonable rate.

"It is notorious that during the past 20 years, and especially during the past 10 years, many utility companies have doubled and quadrupled their capital and effected merger after merger, and that while this was done, supposedly in the interest of economy of operation, our telephone and electric-light bills were not coming down. As against this, it is a definite fact, for example, that electric-light bills have come down in many other places, both in the United States and in Canada.

"Here, for instance, are some comparisons of the actual electric-light bills in some cities of the State as compared with cities of the same size just across our own borders in Ontario. These are based on the householder who uses 50 kilowatt-hours a month, an amount slightly above that used by the average householder in our State. These 50 kilowatts will provide, for example, merely lights and an iron and a toaster. In Albany the monthly bill is $2.85, whereas in Ottawa with the same population it is 99 cents. In Auburn, N.Y., it is $4, whereas in Windsor, Ontario, with the same population it is $1.42. In Buffalo it is $2.03, but in Toronto, Ontario, it is 99 cents. In Binghamton it is $3.60, and in London, Ontario, with the same population it is $1.20. In Rochester it is $3.25, as against the Toronto rate of 99 cents. In Utica it is $3.25, whereas in Hamilton, Ontario, it is $1.20. In New York City the rate runs from $3.50 to $4, whereas the big-city rate in Toronto is only 99 cents.

"I could go on and give you the rates for every city in this State, but the general figures are absolutely on a par with the above, showing that the rates charged by the private utility companies in this State are double or three or four or five times as much as the citizens of Ontario pay. I wish to call your attention to the fact that the rates I have been speaking about are for the barest electrical necessities. It is my wish and ambition to see every housewife in New York State supplied with all the electrical appliances and devices which relieve the burdens of the household.

"I would like to see her have for her use an electric ice box, an electric range, an electric vacuum cleaner, an electric radio, a dish washer, clothes washer, fan, warming pan, waffle iron, and chafing dish, all run by electricity. In this way the housewives of this State will be able to have more leisure and be relieved from household drudgery. It is scientifically estimated that such a houshold would require 285 kilowatt-hours a month, and the Canadian housewife is able to purchase these 285 kilowatts for what our New York housewife has to pay for practically lights alone. In Canada the housewife pays about $3.32 a month for a complete electrical kitchen and household. In New York City such a household would cost about $19.95 a month. In New Rochelle or Mount Vernon the cost of this would be $25.63 per month; in Binghamton $11.15 per month; in Plattsburg $18.15 per month; in Albany $9.90 per month. What is the reason for this wide discrepancy in rates? It is very simple. There is nothing mysterious about it. In Ontario the government itself develops electricity from its water power and delivers it to its citizens at practically cost. Here in New York we have not been so sensible. We have permitted private corporations to monopolize the electrical industry and sell it at the highest rates they could obtain. Of course, they have tried to make as much profit as they could and the result has been this wide difference in rates. My predecessor and I have tried to get the State of New York to follow the example of Ontario. We have for years tried to get the legislature to agree to do this. Each year it was blocked by the Republican leaders at the insistence of the electrical companies. The Republican leaders not only were friendly to the electric corporations, but it is a matter of common knowledge that some of the most influential Republican leaders in this State are tremendous stockholders and directors in electric utilities. Finally, this year, I, with the assistance of public opinion, compelled the Republican legislature to authorize the study by a commission appointed by me of a plan to get electrical rates down near the Canadian rates by the development of our water-power resources. This commission is now at work. I personally have been to the St. Lawrence River with them and inspected those vast resources which I hope will ultimately permit the housewives of this State to have the benefit of cheap electricity in the homes.

"Do not let the political tactics of any political candidates deceive you as to what the paramount issues of this campaign are. Do not forget that this year is the crucial year in the determination of whether our water-power resources will be developed by a State agency for the benefit of the citizens of the State or by private corporations for their own benefit. The commission to bring in a definite plan is now at work. If the Republican candidate is elected, there can be no question in any sane person's mind as to what that determination by the legislature will be. All the Republican leaders who nominated the Republican candidate are committed to development by private corporations. Cheaper electricity in the home must of necessity depend upon development by a public agency under the plan advocated by Governor Smith and myself."

Opening his campaign tour in Binghamton, Governor Roosevelt referred to St. Lawrence power, in a speech given on October 18, 1930, in the following language:

"Later on in the campaign I shall speak more fully of the great question of water-power development and of cheaper electric light for the homes of the State. I mention this subject at this time only to emphasize that it is closely tied to the interests of the housewives of the State. Let me stress this thought. Electric power for the use of industries in almost every part of the State—in other words, the great factories and industrial establishments which use bulk power in great quantities—is being sold at a fairly reasonable rate, a rate in fact which compares favorably with the other parts of the country. The basic reason for this cheap power for industrial operations is the old fact of competition. In other words, if the electrical companies did not give cheap electric power, these great factories would generate their own power and might even try to sell the surplus. Therefore, we have the actual fact of potential competition, and the rates stay down.

"On the other hand, there is no competition when it comes to electric light for the home. It would be uneconomic for an individual householder to try to generate his own electricity. There is no competition in this service and in practically every locality there is an effective monopoly. That is why I am so keenly interested in the prospective development of the St. Lawrence. If this is done, in our State as in Canada at the present time, we shall have, I am confident, much cheaper electricity in the home. This means the release of women from the drudgery of housework. It means that they will have the benefit of electric lights, and of an electric refrigerator, an electric range, electric vacuum cleaner, electric radio, dish washer, clothes washer, and other household appliances all run by electricity. And it means that with this increase in use the cost of these household articles will decrease materially.

"Just in passing let me mention that the household electric light rate here for the average family in Binghamton for 35 kilowatt-hours is $3 per month; that a woman in Canada can have a complete electric kitchen for $3.40 a month, whereas here in Binghamton that same electrified kitchen for an average family would cost $11.15 a month.

"I ask you this very simple question: Do you honestly think that if a Republican governor and a Republican legislature control things in Albany during the next 2 years they will carry through this comprehensive plan which my administration has initiated, a plan looking definitely toward cheaper electricity in the home? I need not remind you that for 20 years the Republican Party has consistently fought for the leasing of the water-power resources of the State to private corporations. I need not point out to you that the leaders of the Republican Party, who dictated this policy of private exploitation, are still in the saddle. The situation is too obvious to deceive the voters of the State. These same leaders—many of them are interested personally and financially in the leading utility and power companies of the State—corporations which have almost a monopoly on the production and sale of electricity. If they could get possession of the water-power resources of the St. Lawrence River by any means, they would not hesitate to do so. The means they are now pursuing is to endeavor to befog this big issue of water power by uttering pious words about the inalienable rights of the people in their water powers. How does that agree with the willingness of these leaders to keep the fee in the people of the State, perhaps, but to lease the water powers to private corporations for so many decades to come that you and I and our children and grandchildren will all be dead before the leases could ever come to an end? What good does it do to retain a mere legal title to the St. Lawrence if we lease out the benefits for 99 years?

"I am sure that the women of the State, particularly, will not be deceived. They are the ones chiefly interested in cheaper electricity in the home."

Perhaps the most important single speech of this campaign was the one delivered by Governor Roosevelt in Syracuse on October 22, 1930, which he devoted entirely to a cogent argument for development of the State's water-power resources by a public agency for the public benefit. This speech follows:

"I want to talk to you tonight on a subject which I deem of paramount importance to the State, but on which the Republican Party this fall cannot point to their record with great pride. It has been a matter of controversy for many years in this State. It has been discussed at length in practically every gubernatorial election in the last 10 years in this State. It has been referred to in this campaign as one of the dominant issues. Apparently, however, so far as possible, the strategy of the Republican campaign seems to be to talk as little as possible about the subject. I refer to the question of the development of the water-power resources of the State by a public agency for the public benefit.

"I am trying in this campaign to bring this subject as close to the homes of the voters as I can. I am trying to point out to our citizens how the development of electricity by the State will directly affect and benefit them in their daily lives.

"While it is true that industry, and particularly manufacturers, have for years enjoyed the benefits and advantages of electricity, it is equally true that the average small consumer in his home is just beginning to realize how important it is for him to obtain not just electricity but cheap electricity in his home. It was clearly brought out before the commission on revision of the public service commission law why the power companies were willing to sell cheap electricity to big industrial consumers. It was because a large manufacturing corporation could produce its own power very cheaply and the utility companies were compelled to sell electricity at low rates in order to prevent these large corporations from setting up their own plants and producing their own electric power. In other words, the competitive principle protects the corporations against exorbitant rates, whereas the private home owner is compelled to buy from a monopoly because he could not under any circumstances produce his own electricity.

"We all know that the great magic of electricity was originally used for lighting purposes only. It then spread to the factory for industrial uses. Now, however, the time has come when electricity should be carried right into our very homes so as to lighten the drudgery of housekeeping. You and I know that scores of electrically operated household appliances have been invented. Of course, the housewives of the State cannot enjoy these new inventions as long as the rates for current continue to run as high as they now do.

"We can observe at close hand the benefits of cheap electricity in the home. Across the St. Lawrence River is the Province of Ontario, Canada. There electricity is developed from water power by what is known as the "Hydroelectric Commission of Ontario" through a league of municipalities where service is rendered to each class of consumer on a strictly cost of service basis.

"It has been estimated by experts that for an average family of 4 people occupying 6 rooms, and about 1,000 square feet of space it would require about 285 kilowatt-hours to run a completely electrified household. This means the using of electricity for light, cooking, refrigeration, ironing, toasting, vacuum cleaning, radio operation, washing machine, fans, waffle irons, chafing dish, and other kitchen appliances. I need not dwell at length on the reduction in household labor which such electrical appliances could bring about. In Toronto and other large cities of Canada it would surprise you to know that all of these appliances can be operated for as little as $3.40 per month. I mean that a woman could have all the benefits of these household labor-saving devices for a month at the rate of $3.40.

"I am sure that that is a sharp contrast to what you people in Syracuse, in New York, in any city, or in any country district would pay for the same thing. As a matter of fact, you in Syracuse would pay almost three times as much, and at that you in Syracuse enjoy a rate which is at least cheaper than most other cities of the State. In New York City, for example, the housewife, for the same appliances, would pay almost six times as much per month, or $19.95. Down in Westchester, which pays almost the highest electricity rates of this State—Mount Vernon or White Plains, for example—the rate would be almost eight times as much, or $25.63. Close by here, in Auburn and in Rochester, the rate would be $13.40. In other words, whereas a woman in Ontario, Canada, in a city of the size of Syracuse, can enjoy a completely electrified household for about $3.40 per month, here in Syracuse you could only get your lights, electric refrigeration, and perhaps a toaster. The idea of cooking by electricity at the rates now prevailing in our State is out of the question, except for rich people.

"In New York City an amount of $3.40 a month would perhaps buy electric lights and maybe an electric iron and a toaster. In New Rochelle, down in Westchester, you would be lucky to get your lights alone for this amount; and in Geneva it would all be consumed in paying merely for electric lights.

"Now of course there are several reasons why there should be such wide difference in rates between the cities in Ontario and the cities in New York State. A kilowatt of electricity is the same whether it is used in Canada or in New York. It takes the same number of kilowatts to cook a beef stew in Toronto as it does in Syracuse. There are several reasons why there should be the wide difference in cost for these kilowatt-hours. Some of these reasons, such as our failure in the past to regulate effectively the public utility companies of the State, and more particularly, the electric light and power companies, and the absence in the State of the effective threat of competition by municipalities, I shall discuss in later speeches during this campaign.

"It is unquestionably true that the break-down in regulation has done much to keep our electrical rates high, and that we have been far behind other governments in permitting our municipalities to go into the business of selling its citizens electricity whenever its citizens wish to do so, and whenever they find that they are being charged unreasonable and exorbitant rates by their local utility companies; but I wish to concentrate on what is by far the more important and fundamental reason. In Canada, this league of municipalities develops electricity from their own water power. They develop it for the benefit of their own citizens. They sell it to their citizens at as near cost as possible. While, for decades, we have been permitting the millions of horsepower lying in the flow of the St. Lawrence River to go idly by on its way to the ocean, the Canadian municipalities have been taking advantage of their natural water-power resources so as to convert it into cheap electricity.

"Here in New York we have not been so wise. We have given franchises to private corporations to develop electricity from both water power and coal. After the electricity has been developed by these private corporations, they, of course, naturally want to sell it for as great a profit as they possibly can. They naturally are not interested in the consumer. They are interested only in their own profits. In Canada, electricity is more cheaply developed and is sold only with a view toward benefiting the consumer. In New York, we have electricity developed in a more expensive manner and sold primarily with a view toward benefiting the private corporation.

"Now, why haven't we been doing the same thing in New York? It is an old story, and those of you who have been interested in State campaigns are familiar with it. As far back as 1907 the question had become acute as to how the water power in the St. Lawrence and Niagara Rivers was going to be developed. Up to that time, and indeed as late as 5 years after, the State of New York had been granting franchises to private corporations permitting them to use the waters of the Niagara River for their own private profit.

"During the last two summers I have been up to the Niagara and St. Lawrence Rivers a number of times. On these visits I have seen power houses erected by private corporations which obtained franchises from the State practically for nothing. I could not but reflect on the short-sighted policy of those past legislatures which had so wantonly given away the heritage of the people of the State.

"I had long before that given the subject much consideration and had come definitely to the conclusion that that policy had been uneconomic and unsound; but as I stood on the banks of the St. Lawrence and Niagara Rivers and saw this rich possession, which should rightfully belong to the people of our State, going into the power houses of private corporations, I formed a firm resolve that so long as I am Governor, and so long as it is at all possible for a State agency to develop these resources, that no more would they be given or leased to private corporations.

"You all recall the violent struggle which Governor Smith carried on with a Republican legislature over this question since his very first election. He and our party had definitely alined themselves on the side of the principle that these water-power resources must be developed by an agency of the people for the benefit of the people themselves. The Republican Party, on the other hand, in its platform, in its public utterances, and in the speeches of its leaders, had definitely thrown down the gauntlet in favor of leasing these resources to private corporations for private exploitation. Four times we went to the polls on that predominant issue; four times the people of the State voted in favor of public development. The Republican legislative leaders refused to yield. You all remember the stirring days, at the end of the year 1926. Under the plan of reorganized government which was to go into effect on January 1, 1927, water-power leases were not to be effective unless approved by the Governor. But up to January 1, 1927, water-power leases could have been given out by the Republican-controlled water-power commission without the consent of the Governor. A few weeks remained of the year 1926. The Republican leaders of the State had come to the conclusion that now, if ever, was their opportunity to lease this water power to private companies. They publicly announced that they were going to do it, just 3 weeks before they were to go out of existence themselves, and just 3 weeks before the Governor was to be given the veto power over leases. The people of the State were startled at this daring. Public opinion was aroused. Protests began to come in from various parts of the State. Finally, Governor Smith, not being able to obtain the assistance of the Republican attorney general, Mr. Ottinger, whose signature was about to be affixed to the lease, was compelled to go out to obtain private counsel to prevent this wrong on the people. He issued a challenge, daring the Republican leaders to go through with it. The Republican leaders were afraid to do it. The lease was never signed.

"And since then the fight has been carried on. When I first came to Albany we were no nearer a solution than ever before.

The Republican leaders were still for private development. They had for years been engaged in an attempt to deceive the people of the State by such phrases as inalienable rights of the people in the fee of their water-power resources. They used these high-sounding expressions and at the same time recommended that the development be by means of leases for long terms. Now, you and I know, that if we own a piece of property and lease it away for 99 years, it doesn't do us very much good to talk about our inalienable rights in the fee of that piece of property. If the State is going to lease away to private corporations for a period of 99 years, the benefits of its water power, it won't do you or me any good to reflect upon our inalienable rights in the fee of that water power. The point is that for 99 years we have no control over the uses to which our property is put. The fact will still remain, and I am sure will be impressed upon us with each monthly electric-light bill, that although the people might have the inalienable right to the power, the private electric corporations will continue to have their inalienable right to their inordinate profits.

"In my speech of acceptance, as the Democratic candidate for Governor, I stated that the time had come for the definite establishment of the principles as a part of our fundamental law, that the physical possession and development of our State-owned water-power sites shall not pass from the hands of the people of the State. In my very first annual message to the legislature, I asked them to take up the question of the development of our water-power resources so that the title and constant control of the power generated at the sources shall remain vested in the people and shall not be alienated by long-term leases. I asked the Republican leaders of the legislature to introduce these bills themselves, so that it could be made a nonpartisan measure. They refused to do it. I then asked the Democratic leaders to introduce it, and they not only introduced it, but made motions to discharge the Republican committees from consideration of the bills, so that each individual legislator might have an opportunity to express himself on the matter. The Republican leaders would not even permit the bills to get out of the committee and they were smothered. During the last days of the 1929 session, I again urged the legislature to pass this legislation, and again they refused.

"In the meantime, public opinion had become more and more aroused. It was becoming more and more felt. Finally the next year, 1930, after I had again requested the legislature to take steps toward this development, and when they could no longer withstand the force of public opinion, they introduced and passed a bill providing for a commission to be appointed by me to set up a plan whereby the water-power resources of the State on the St. Lawrence River could be developed by a State agency for the benefit of the consumers themselves so as to provide the cheapest rates and best service for the people of the State.

"That commission has been appointed by me and is now at work formulating a plan by which I hope the people will ultimately obtain the real advantages in cheap electricity which their natural resources contain.

"I do not, of course, claim the credit for this final victory. For years the fight had been carried on by Democratic statesmen, and particularly by Governor Smith. I merely took up the battle where he had left off, but neither he or I nor both of us could have made any headway had it not been for that ever-growing, ever-insistent public opinion which had expressed itself so overwhelmingly time and again at the polls throughout the State and which was demanding its right and due in the form of cheaper electricity. And although the claim has been made by the Republican Party that it was they who started this commission on its way, I can but quote from an editorial of the New York Times of September 24, 1930, which says, 'The truth is that the Republicans, their protestations to the contrary notwithstanding, surrendered to the Governor on this issue last winter.'

"But still the surrender was only a half-hearted one. I was indeed surprised to read this in the 1930 platform of the Republican Party: 'We promise a speedy solution of the problem of development of water-power resources of the State which shall be based on sound and economic principles rather than on political expediency.' Those words have a familiar air. I used to read words like those in the Republican platform which had definitely declared for the policy of private leases. Frankly, I do not like that language. I much prefer, and I am sure the voters of the State will much prefer, the language of the Democratic platform, which says on this subject, 'Electric energy should be developed by the State from its water-power resources in order to insure low-priced electricity.' Now, in this campaign let us face the obvious facts. You and I know who the leaders of the Republican Party are. You and I know that these leaders, or at least a great many of them, are definitely and publicly alined with the great electric-utility companies of the State. They are officers and they are large stockholders in electric and power companies which, in combination, have almost a monopoly of electricity and power in this State. Do they want the State to develop this water power or would they like to have their own companies do it? Are they interested in providing cheap electricity for you or are they interested in providing large profits for themselves? You and I know that these leaders of the Republican Party, so closely tied up with the great electric utility companies of the State, are the ones who dictate to the party, not only their policies, but also, in many cases, their candidates.

"You must remember that when this commission which I appointed brings in its report the work is only half done. I know that that commission will do its full duty. I, myself, personally, went up to the St. Lawrence River with them and personally inspected the sites on which we all hope the State will soon erect its huge power structures.

"But when that work is done by the Commission, before anything further can be done, the Legislature of the State of New York and the Governor must approve. I cannot believe and I am sure that the voters of the State will not believe that a Republican legislature and a Republican Governor will look so kindly upon this plan of public development against which they have for so many years and through so many administrations fought and protested. I cannot believe, especially in view of the language of the Republican platform this year, that they will not do all in their power to hamper and prevent and delay any form of public development for the benefit of the people.

"It would be only common sense on the part of the people to intrust the development of that plan and the carrying out of those policies to the party which, for so many years, has struggled and fought for its initiation. You can, each one of you, do your share on election day toward the realization of that theory of development which has so long actuated and formed intelligent public opinion in the State.

"Some Republican statesmen and party leaders are still renewing the old objection that this plan is putting the State into business. Nothing could be further from the truth. Suppose the Republican Party had had its way and had given a franchise to a private corporation to develop this power, what would have happened? It would have gone out and would have hired engineers and would have proceeded to construct a dam across the St. Lawrence River. It would, of course, have first obtained by negotiation the cooperation of the authorities of the Province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada and of the Federal authorities in Washington. The State can do the same thing. It can get the same engineers and can by contract build the same kind of dam, and I for one am unwilling to say that the State, through its agency, cannot do this job just as efficiently as a private corporation. In fact, by virtue of its powers as to tax exemption, and eminent domain, it could do it much more cheaply and efficiently.

"Once the power is developed, and is ready for sale, then the State is in a position to dictate the price at which it can be delivered to the ultimate consumer. We have no desire to infringe upon the legitimate reasonable profits of any investor in public-utility stocks. He is entitled to a fair return on his investment.

"That is the whole story, and let us once and for all stop talking about whether the State should be put into business or not.

"The important duty of every citizen of the State—lawyer, business men, the press, the agricultural interests, and the average 'man in the street'—is from now on to work whole-heartedly for the carrying out of the proposed policy and the plan which, I am confident, will result therefrom. I am confident that the great majority of citizens of the State want to see something done—believe that we must work out a State-agency method of development of our great natural electrical resources in such a way that the control of these resources will never pass from the actual possession of the State itself."

In another campaign address in the Borough of the Bronx, New York City, on October 27, 1930, Governor Roosevelt referred to the St. Lawrence as follows:

"Take the battle over water power, for instance. Ever since Governor Smith went to Albany, each and every year he tried to get the legislature to start a plan for the development of the water-power resources of the State by a State agency. Year after year the Republican leaders refused to do it. Year after year the demand from the people of the State became more insistent—year after year the Republican leaders ignored it. In 1929, when I first became Governor, I renewed the demand on behalf of the people that their water-power resources be preserved and developed for their benefit. Again in 1929 the leaders of obstruction refused to do it. Finally, in 1930, they yielded. The commission is now at work. And so the idea of public development of water power is marching on. It still has a long way to go before it can reach a successful conclusion. The next legislature and Governor must first approve any plan brought in by the commission. You and I know that a Republican legislature and a Republican Governor will never look kindly upon a plan of public development. For years they have been openly committed to the theory of turning over the water-power resources of the State to private corporations under a lease for a long term of years. We have only to look at the Republican platforms of the last 8 years to see how definitely they have been committed to development by private companies; and even this year, even after the appointment of the commission, they still refuse to come out definitely for development by a State agency. Even their candidates, who have said practically nothing on this great subject of water power when they do speak of its development, use indefinite and insincere language. Not a single one of them has come out for public development. Not a single one of them is interested in cheaper electricity for our homes. The idea of public development will certainly get no sympathy from them.

"The Democratic policy toward the great water power of this State does not contemplate the State's going into the business of selling electricity to the homes, nor does it seek to deprive any legitimate investor of his legitimate return; but it does seek first to regulate public utilities so that they will make a fair return and secondly to provide a great volume of cheap water-made power to make lower rates possible—and it proposes to control that water power continually and perpetually so that there can be no question that that plan can be carried out."

In a campaign address in Yonkers, Westchester County, on October 28, 1930, where there had been much public discussion of utility rates alleged to be exorbitant, Governor Roosevelt said:

"There are several angles to this fight, but they all point toward the same result—cheaper rates and better service. First, there is the development of cheap electricity from our water power. The Republican Party has always been committed to the policy of giving this power to private corporations for private profit by lease for a long term of years. On the other hand, Governor Smith and I, and indeed the entire Democratic Party, have been pledged to development of our water power by a State agency with only one object in view, namely, to get electricity as cheaply as possible for the citizens of our State. I am sure that no community in our State has suffered and is suffering so much from the greed of private electric-light companies as this county of Westchester. Your household rates are not only on the whole higher than in almost any other place in the State, but they have been arranged and prescribed in so complicated a manner that the householder must get a headache every time he tries to figure out his bill.

"We in New York State, and most particularly in Westchester County, can very well take our lesson from our neighbors in Ontario, Canada, who are now enjoying benefits of cheaper electricity through their foresightedness in having their electricity developed by a State agency from its own water power. Do you know that the housewives in Canada are able to run a completely electrified household for an average family for as little as $3.40 per month? And when I say a completely electrified household I mean just that; I mean electric lights and electric cooking; I mean electric icebox, electric flatiron, toaster, vacuum cleaner, sewing machine, fan, curling iron, chafing dish, ironer, and warming pan, and mixer and waffle iron. All of these things for $3.40 a month. How much would that buy here in Yonkers or in New Rochelle or any other city in Westchester? Any woman in this audience will tell you that she is lucky to get her electric lights alone for that amount. It has been scientifically figured that a complete electric household such as I have detailed to you, consumes 285 kilowatt-hours per month. Here in Yonkers that would cost you $21.45 per month. Just compare that with the Canadian rate of $3.40. In New Rochelle or in Mount Vernon it would cost even more. It would cost $25.63, almost eight times as much as it costs in Toronto. Why? The reason is as I have stated: Canada develops its electricity from its water power and sells it at cost to its citizens. Here in Westchester privately owned utility companies, interested only in making as much money as they can dictate the prices. Your rates here in Westchester must necessarily continue to be many times higher than what your neighbors in Ontario pay until the State of New York begins to convert the vast water-power resources of its rivers into cheap electricity which can come into your iceboxes and ranges and light bulbs.

"I want to repeat here the warning which I have given the voters in every part of this State. Do not trust the development of this electricity to the Republican Party, which has for a generation fought to turn this water power over to private corporations, and which even this year in its platform refuses to commit either itself or its candidates to the development of that water power by a public agency. You have read in the newspapers only very rare statements of the Republican leaders on this question, and whenever they have been made they have been vague and indefinite. The nearest thing to commitment was the expression of a faint hope that the Governor's commission would make a report so economically sound that it could be supported by them. That kind of language is the same kind that has been used for years in Republican platforms. Of course, what is 'economically sound, from the point of view of Mr. Machold or the public utility corporations, may not be 'economically sound' from the point of view of the people of this State, and vice versa. A great deal depends upon the viewpoint from which the 'economic soundness' is looked at. By 'economically sound' everyone knows the Republican leaders mean rates that meet with the full approval and approbation of Mr. Machold and his friends. I pledge myself and my party, on the contrary, to a development by a State agency for the benefit of our citizens, if any feasible plan for such development can possibly be worked out.

"I also am equally anxious that this plan be economically sound, but my definition of 'economically sound' is rates which will give the citizens of our State electricity at the lowest possible cost without exorbitant profits on the part of the companies."

Governor Roosevelt spoke in Jamaica, in the Borough of Queens, October 29, 1930, and in the course of his campaign speech there said, with reference to the Republican State party platform:

"Then comes that priceless statement in the Republican platform about water power. First, they say:

"'We promise a speedy solution of the problem of developing the water-power resources of the State, which shall be based on sound economic principles.' I sometimes wonder if my old friend Mr. Edmund Machold, the directing genius of the leading power combines in this State, and at the same time the owner of the Republican State organization, seriously thinks that he is fooling the electorate of this State, either up-State or down-State, when he hands out a joyous line like that. We all know that development on what he calls 'sound economic principles' means to him and his fellow leader just one thing—development by his company. He and his party have both been committed to that principle for the last 12 years.

"Compare the Republican statement that they are in favor of development on 'sound economic principles', which means exactly zero, with the consistent Democratic principle that the State-owned water powers must and shall be developed by the State itself and retained for all time in the actual physical possession of the State and developed solely in order to insure low-priced electricity for the people of the State, without any inordinate or unreasonable profits to any corporation.

"Then the Republican platform goes on with what is almost the last straw. It says: 'At the last session of the legislature the Republican majority on its own initiative did what it could to take this vexatious question out of politics by authorizing the Governor to appoint a commission, etc., etc.'

"Let me ask you this simple question: If a horse balks and simply declines for hour after hour to go where its driver wants him to go and finally under spur and lash makes up his mind to go where the driver wants him to go, does that horse do so on his own initiative? Perhaps I should have—I know I should have said elephant instead of horse.

"Every school child in the State knows that the Republican majority in the last legislature finally yielded after Governor Smith and I, backed up by the whip and spur of public indignation and by public insistence, forced those leaders to give in."

Nearing the close of his campaign Governor Roosevelt said in Brooklyn on October 31, 1930:

"In times when everybody has plenty of work and wages are high the average individual, whether it be the man who works or the woman who runs the home, will do little figuring on his electric-light bills. That is one reason, perhaps, why in this year of depression there is so much evidence of interest in the problem of water-power development and the regulation of public utilities. I do not have to say much about the St. Lawrence development. You and I are fully aware that the last legislature finally surrendered after fighting Governor Smith and me over a period of 12 long years. It is my hope that from now on the development by a direct agency of the State will go forward, thus giving assurance that this water power will never for a single moment be taken away from the possession of the people and that it will be developed primarily for the benefit of lower rates to the people. Republican control of the executive branch of the government in Albany means very clearly and very definitely, and without any 'ifs' or 'buts', that the present plan for public development of the St. Lawrence will be scrapped and the Republican plan for private development will be substituted."

The fact that Governor Roosevelt was reelected by an overwhelming majority, a majority which exceeded any other given to a Governor of New York up to that time, and that his campaign was fought with the water-power development on the St. Lawrence as a dominant issue, indicates that the people of New York thoroughly understand and approved his leadership on this great public question.

GOV. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT AND THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER PROJECT FOR THE YEAR 1931

While the St. Lawrence Power Development Commission, created to study proposals for utilizing the State's resources and to report a plan of development, was still engaged in its task, the legislature of 1931 convened. The only reference to water power, therefore, in Governor Roosevelt's annual message to the legislature, delivered on January 7, 1931, was a statement that a report was to be made shortly. This reference was:

"After generations of discussion of the development of the water-power resources of the State, the legislature last year created a commission for a comprehensive study of a method of development by a public authority. This commission will transmit its report to your honorable bodies within a very short time, and I trust that action will be taken at this session providing for water-power development by a public agency for the purpose of producing cheaper electricity for the people of the State."

The report of the commission was submitted to the Governor and the legislature on January 15, 1931. Its comprehensive scope, including engineering, marketing, and legal findings, required intensive study; and Governor Roosevelt, therefore, took the opportunity to send a special message to the legislature dated January 19, 1931, in which he presented a résumé of the majority and minority reports of the commission. This message was as follows:

"In order to clarify and simplify the questions involved in the voluminous and necessarily technical reports of the St. Lawrence Power Commission, I have studied and summarized the problems and the recommendations. Here is the background.

"On March 12, 1929, I sent a special message to the legislature in which I laid down these general principles:

"In making use of this potential energy on the St. Lawrence owned by the people of the State, the objective of the problem is essentially this:

"1. The physical transforming of falling water into electrical current.

"2. The transmission and distribution of this current from the plant where it is developed to the industries and homes of the people of the State.

"The first objective was seriously opposed by many people who insisted for varying motives that the physical building of a dam was fraught with danger, that the cost would be prohibitive, and that generation by steam had become as cheap as by water-power."

"The commission unanimously finds:

"(a) The dam can be built with 100 percent of safety, actual construction being on dry land by the method of diverting the river first on one side of an island and then on the other side.

"(b) The cost would be about $70,000,000 less than any previous estimate.

"(c) The cost of generation per horsepower would be $10, as against a $25 cost for steam power.

"This is an outstanding vindication for those of us who have supported the project against insidious propaganda for private development. It should foreclose for all time to come further discussion of public development of the St. Lawrence site.

"Next is the question, 'Who shall get the power?'

"In 1929 and 1930 I have consistently held that the power should be developed for the primary benefit of the consumer at the lowest possible rates compatible with a fair return on the investment; and, furthermore, I have stressed the fact that the home user is the one to be given first consideration, because today the small-home owners and storekeepers are carrying a relatively far greater burden than the industrial user. That is the primary objective of transmission and distribution, and both the majority and minority reports point out that the entire policy of development should be to provide the maximum benefits for domestic consumers, farmers, and small users of power. This coincides with my views expressed not only in my message to the legislature but a great many times thereafter. I emphasized the fact that my interest in water-power development was primarily to get it into the homes of the women of the State and in the small shops and stores, and that only secondarily was it to be used for the huge manufacturing industries."

"The majority report says in this connection:

"'All effort should be made to secure the maximum possible reduction in rates to domestic and to small commercial users. In other words, we believe that the principle of "selling on a commercial basis" should be applied to industrial consumers of power, and that the resulting profits on this business should be applied to the reduction of rates of other consumers. * * * Not being in a position to protect themselves by an exercise of their bargaining power, they require the protection of their Government in the enjoyment of service at the lowest possible rates. * * * and since the transmission and distribution costs of the industrial power supplied near the site will be very small, a profit may be expected on this part of the business—a profit which should be applied to the reduction of rates to the small customer. * * * It must always be borne in mind that as a practical matter the large consumer of power is able to protect himself much more effectively than the small consumer. For example, he can usually install his own generating plant. Indeed, this possibility has actually resulted in the establishment of comparatively low rates to large industrial users. It is the small consumer who is unable to cope with the situation. It is he who stands in great need of help from the State. In the judgment of the commissioners the accent should be put upon his needs.'

"Thus the entire commission, both the majority and the minority, as well as I myself, are interested chiefly not so much in the disposition of this power to industries which might locate near the St. Lawrence River, but in its cheap sale and transmission to household consumers. Of course, by reason of the fact that the flow of the river is practically constant, the power will be generated during the entire day all the year round at a nearly constant load. Only large industrial plants can use peak power 24 hours a day, and it is therefore practicable and feasible to encourage certain types of industry to locate near the site of the power house for the use of this constant load.

"Next comes the matter of the price which consumers, away from the site itself, principally the small consumers, will have to pay for electricity.

"Hitherto we have relied wholly on public service commission regulation of rates. We all know the long story of how court decisions, valuations, rate bases, complicated accountings, newly invented methods of finance, and unsatisfactory leadership in the public service commission itself have made impossible the fulfillment of the original purposes of regulation.

"Something new had to be done. I said to the legislature in 1929:

"'That is why in trying to treat this whole problem of development, transmission, and distribution of St. Lawrence power as a complete picture in the interests of the people of the State, I have sought a method by which we could avoid the rate-regulating powers of the public service commission, tied up as it is at the present time by Federal court rulings. I have, therefore, after consultation with many experts on the subject, come to the conclusion that the representatives or trustees who develop the power can enter into contract with transmitting and distributing companies, under which contracts a fair price to the consumer will be guaranteed, this price to make allowances only for a fair return to the companies on the actual capital invested in the transmitting and distributing of this particular power energy. It is a method which is frankly based on theory of contract rather than the theory of regulation.'

"The majority and the minority of the commission both agree with that statement made by me—that the rates should not be subject to the control of the public service commission, but should be fixed by contract based on a definite method of accounting and valuation, which would insure fair rates for all time to come.

"The majority of the commission states it this way: 'There can be no question but that the existence of litigation in rate cases is a waste which should be avoided by the utility companies as well as by the State. If it is found practicable through a process of negotiation to establish a system of rate control by contract which will adequately safeguard the consumer, a great step forward will have been taken.'

"The minority of the commission says the same thing in another way in recommendation F—'That the trustees seek to negotiate with the utility companies a contract for the transmission and distribution of the power, which contract by its terms should bind the utility companies to transmit and distribute to consumers all of the power generated at rates or prices to consumers to be fixed in the contract, on the basis of charges, the lowest consistent with a fair return to the power authority on the investment.'

"The next question is, how to transmit the power; i.e., the question of the main transmission lines to carry the power to point of distribution.

"I foresaw, of course, as everyone does, the possibility that existing private companies might refuse to treat with the State on fair terms for the transmission of this electricity under a contractual relationship fixing their rates and profits. It was for that reason that I viewed with such alarm the merger of the three largest holding companies of power corporations into the joint merger of the Niagara-Hudson Power Co. The creation of this superutility deprived the State of its right to bargain with several companies and compelled it to bargain with this company alone.

"I want everybody to reread the following clear statement in my 1929 message, for it is just as true now as it was then:

"'Are the business men of this State willing to transmit and distribute this latent water power on a fair return on their investment? If they are satisfied, here is their opportunity. If not, then the State may have to go into the transmission business itself. It cannot, on the one hand, let this power go to waste, nor on the other, be required to yield to anyone who would aim to exploit the State's resources for inordinate profit.

"'We shall soon know whether or not such a contract can be made. If the trustees can make it and it commends itself to the people of the State, then the legislature and I will approve of it, and we can go ahead. But if no such contract can be made, we shall know the reasons why, and protect ourselves accordingly. I want to be in accord with sound business principles. I believe there are enough good business men in this State who see this problem as clearly as I do and will be glad to join with the State in this endeavor. I want to give to business this big opportunity to participate in a public service.

"'If these proposals become law, we shall have the opportunity of ascertaining whether or not business and finance will accept this way of developing the State's resources for its industries, its commerce, and its homes. On the one hand is the policy of public ownership and control of our power sites, dams, and power plants with private operation of transmission lines and distributing systems, allowing a fair return on actual cash capital investment. On the other side is one of two courses, either exploitation by private interests or else public ownership and operation, not only of the site, the dam, and the power but of the transmission lines and distribution systems as well.'

"What does the commission say? The chief divergence between the majority and minority reports is as follows:

"Both favor a contract with a private utility company by which in effect such company can collect only for the actual cost of actual services rendered plus a reasonable profit. That is the objective of the proposed contract form of delivering the power. The minority, however, recommends that if such a contract for transmission cannot be made on a fair basis with an existing utility company the authority should try to get some other private company, existing or to be organized, to carry the power; and that it is wholly possible to interest private investment in such a company, because the earnings would in effect be based on a firm contract with the power authority.

"As an alternative to this, if such private transmission cannot be contracted for, the minority report recommends that the power authority itself build transmission lines in order to bring the cheap power into the homes and shops of small consumers. In this connection both the majority and minority of the commission fully realize that municipalities or lighting districts could purchase this cheap power for distribution to their citizens if, because of existing poor service or exorbitant rates, it became necessary.

"The majority says: 'Your commission is aware that a considerable number of municipal distributing systems are already in existence in New York State, and that they are charging rates which compare very favorably with the rates charged by private companies operating under similar conditions. These municipal systems should be given full opportunity to purchase a reasonable share of the St. Lawrence River power at such prices as may be necessary to cover the cost of generation and of transmission. Moreover, any municipal or other political subdivision of the State that chooses in the future to engage in the distribution of electrical current, should be given the opportunity to purchase St. Lawrence power on conditions at least as favorable as those which are offered to private distributing systems. In the event that all of the water power shall be sold to private transmission and distribution companies at the generating station, this sale should not be made except under a contractual agreement whereby these companies will transmit a reasonable share of the power to municipal plants at prices representing no more than a fair spread to cover the cost of transmission.'

"These two alternatives which the power authority would have in determining the method of transmitting electricity are, of course, the only bargaining club in its possession in its negotiations with the present utility monopoly. If it did not have these alternatives, the State would be at the complete mercy of the Niagara-Hudson Power Co. I believe that these alternatives form the very foundation of the plan, which will have its ultimate attainment only when the homes of the State get cheap electricity. I believe that these two alternatives provide the whip hand, the trump card, with which the State can treat with the Power Trust, and I believe that they should be emphasized to the utmost.

"The majority of the commission does not lose sight of this alternative. In fact, it points out in its report, though not in so specific a manner, the efficacy of these alternatives as a bargaining weapon.

"The majority report states: 'Can satisfactory arrangements be made between the power authority and privately owned transmission and distribution companies? * * * We hope that it will be feasible to make an acceptable contract. A genuine effort should be made to secure such a contract before consideration is given to a plan for State transmission and distribution. * * * In the event of the inability of the trustees to make such a contract, they shall have such authority as is necessary to make other disposition of the power.' Of course, the phrase 'to make other disposition of the power' would necessarily include the two alternatives about which I have spoken, and it must be clear to anyone reading the report that the majority of the commission is desirous of retaining in the hands of the power authority these bargaining weapons with which the State should enter into negotiations with the power companies. The minority report stresses the importance of being specific and clear about the two alternatives—putting them in plain language into the law creating the power authority.

"I desire to repeat, however, that both reports should be a source of gratification to those of us who have been interested in cheaper electricity in the homes. They show, first, that the power can be developed cheaply; second, that the rates at which it is to be sold to the ultimate consumer should be fixed by contract in the interest of the consumer; third, that if the contract is impossible to obtain, alternative methods should be pursued which would ultimately place this power in the homes of our citizens at low rates; fourth, that the authorities of the United States and Canada have so far evidenced an attitude of friendly cooperation; fifth, that the time is ripe for the creation by the legislature of a power authority with legislative sanction to proceed to carry to completion its negotiations, as well as such further necessary studies as need be made of the building of transmission lines by the State, or the possibility of the creation of a new corporation to undertake to contract with the State for the transmission of this cheap electricity.

"I trust your honorable bodies will study and act on these most vital reports."

Numerous conferences were held by Governor Roosevelt with members of the commission. Finally, on March 4, 1931, a proposed bill to carry out its recommendations was submitted by the commission and introduced in the legislature by the Republican leaders.

On this occasion Governor Roosevelt issued the following statement:

"I believe that the submission of this bill should be hailed by proponents of public, governmental, water-power development as a remarkable step toward the attainment of their ultimate goal. If you had told the most ardent and enthusiastic 3 years ago that such a bill would be possible today, they would have laughed at you. And yet, here we are with a definite, concrete proposal, submitted after a careful survey by a commission authorized by the legislature and equipped with expert legal and engineering assistance, which embodies every sound principle and policy which reasonable progressive opinion advocates.

"The bill is in principle acceptable to me. There are a number of amendments which I should like to see made, and on which I propose to invite the legislative leaders into conference. I sincerely hope that this bill will pass, with the amendments I have in mind.

"The bill conforms with the principles which I laid down in my messages of March 12, 1929, and January 19, 1931, to the legislature on this subject, in practically all of its fundamentals:

"1. It definitely establishes the policy and principle of constant inalienable public ownership and control for all time to come.

"2. It sets up a public agency, to be appointed by the Governor with the advice and consent of the senate, to build the necessary dam and power houses by the issuance of bonds.

"3. It declares that the primary purpose for the development of this electricity is the benefit of the people of the State as a whole, and particularly the domestic and rural consumers of the State so that the homes and farms of the State may receive cheap electricity; and that only the secondary purpose is the furnishing of cheaper electricity to factories and industrial establishments.

"4. The people of the State can be fully and adequately protected from every angle in the sale of this power, right down to and including the time when it actually comes into their homes and farms, for the following reasons:

"A. The rates to be charged for electricity shall be definitely fixed by a contract or contracts. In this way, all of the troubles which now exist in fixing rates of utilities will be avoided, in that all the judge-made law concerning goodwill, reproduction cost, going value, franchise value, etc., will be avoided. Rates will be based only on actual costs, under accounting methods which will avoid all of the present ingenious methods of devious financing used by some of our utility companies. The public-service commission will not be able to grant any increase in rates under any circumstances.

"B. The power authority is given power to enter into one or more contracts with any corporation or corporations, whether now existing or to be formed in the future, for the transmission of this electricity from the power house to the various localities in the State, and with any corporation, old or new, for its distribution into the individual homes and farms. Under the very terms of the bill, the details of these contracts are so laid out that the rates to be paid by the people, as before stated, will be fixed on an actual cost basis at the lowest possible figure. There is absolutely no limit as to which company or how many companies the power authority can contract with. Under the provisions of the bill, it can contract with an existing utility company or with several; if it wishes it can contract with any other kind of a corporation, or several; if it wishes it can contract with a new corporation, or corporations, to be organized for the purpose; and if it wishes it can be instrumental in forming a new corporation for the purpose of making this contract, or contracts.

"C. Any contract or contracts which it desires to enter into shall be subjected to public inspection and public hearings beforehand, after due public notice. The contract or contracts will be subject to the approval of the Governor, who will be given sufficient time and a sufficient appropriation to enable him to enter into an extended investigation of the contract and all that it means for the people of the State, and to permit him to entertain any objections made by various municipalities or groups of consumers, and so protect in every way the interests of the people.

"D. In the event that the power authority decides that it cannot make a contract or contracts which are advantageous to the people of the State, or in the event that the Governor disapproves of the proposed contracts on the ground that they are not advantageous to the State, the power authority is then directed to get up a plan whereby the State can build its own transmission lines and distributing systems so as to do the whole job itself. Before, however, actually building the lines, the plan will have to be approved by the legislature and the Governor.

"E. Every municipality or municipal lighting district that has its own distribution system, or every municipality or municipal lighting district which establishes one, is to have a preference in the purchase of this electricity from the power authority for distribution among its citizens.

"Therefore, the bill provides the two bargaining clubs which I have always insisted were necessary for the full protection of the people. The fact that these bargaining clubs clearly appear in this bill, proposed by the majority of the commission, shows plainly that the commission at all times, as I set forth in my message of January 19, 1931, to the legislature, had in mind the necessity of these alternate methods in dealing with any existing utility company or companies which might refuse to enter into a contract which the Governor ultimately would deem advisable for the best interest of the people of the State. These alternatives are, of course, as above set forth: (1) The power to disregard any existing utility company or companies in making contracts for the transmission or distribution of the power; and (2) the definately stated proposal for the State to enter into a plan of transmission by itself through its own transmission lines and distributing systems, built and maintained by itself.

"I hope that I may be pardoned the expression of considerable pride and gratification that the legislature and I have been able, during my short tenure in the executive chamber at Albany, to arrive thus far toward fulfilling what I know to be the universal desire in this State to develop the tremendous electrical energy in the St. Lawrence River by a State agency with the sole consideration in mind of providing cheap electricity to the people of the State. I hope that the principle enunciated in this bill will be the forerunner of similar legislation for the development of other water power in this State, as well as in other States. I consider it an outstanding triumph in the battle of the people for the retention for themselves of the benefits of their natural water-power resources instead of turning them over to private corporations for selfish exploitation. The safeguards in this bill, whereby every proposed contract is not only wholly open to public inspection but also to approval by the Governor after careful investigation could only be circumvented in the future by a combination of complete lack of public interest plus a set of faithless public officials. There is no doubt in my mind that if contracts that are honestly in the public interest and that provide really reasonable rates for electricity cannot be made, then the legislature and the Governor will take the next economically sound step for publicly owned transmission lines and some new form of public or quasi-public distribution."

The conferences with legislative leaders continued, particularly over the question of amendments to the proposed bill. An important conference was held on March 23, 1931, and on March 25, 1931. Two days later, Governor Roosevelt made public a communication directed to the majority leaders of the senate and assembly in which he set forth his suggestions for certain changes in the pending bill. (For text of this communication, see copy of mimeographed release issued from the Governor's office on March 25, 1931, which is appended to this memorandum.)

These differences appeared to be adjusted and the bill was passed by the lower house of the legislature. It was pending in the senate, scheduled for passage. Suddenly Senator John Knight, majority leader, introduced an amendment which named the five members of the development commission as the trustees of the proposed power authority, instead of leaving the appointments to the Governor, the form in which the bill passed the assembly. A situation was created which immediately led Governor Roosevelt to issue a strong statement of explanation. The statement, dated April 2, 1931, follows:

"Word has just come to me that the St. Lawrence power development bill, introduced by Mr. Cornaire, and passed by the assembly in substantially the same form as it was prepared by the St. Lawrence commission, has been suddenly and unexpectedly amended in the senate in a way which I cannot accept. The amendment deliberately strikes out the power of the Governor to appoint the members of the power authority. Instead, it substitutes therefor five individuals by name.

"On Monday, March 23, in a conference with the leaders of the legislature I specifically and in very definite terms told the president pro tempore of the senate and the speaker of the assembly that I could not accept any amendment taking the appointive power away from the Governor and gave my reasons therefor—reasons which were apparently acceptable to the assembly, as no change of this character was made by that body. In view of this clear understanding by the president pro tempore of the senate, I am forced to the conclusion that this amendment is deliberately made for the purpose of making certain my veto of the bill, and thereby creating an excuse for postponing any action for another year. It is in line with the long policy of obstruction, objection, and refusal even to consider any legislation which looked to conserving for the people their rights in this water power which has marked the attitude of the Republican leaders in the legislature for many years past—a policy which public opinion forced them to abandon last year and which this year has made it impossible for them to delay in any legitimate way the final step toward the creation of the power authority.

"I have conceded much in order to get action on power development, and each concession has been followed by the raising of some new objection.

"Last year, after a continued campaign of opposition and delay, the Republican leaders finally consented to my appointment of a commission of five men to study and report plans for developing power on the St. Lawrence. This bill not only provided that these five men should be appointed by the Governor but further specifically and definitely provided that, in the event of a favorable report on a plan by this commission, the proposed power authority itself should 'consist of five trustees * * * to be named by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.' This winter the report of the investigating commission itself provided that the power authority should consist of five trustees to be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The bills as introduced in the assembly by a Republican legislator provided that the power authority should be appointed by the Governor in exactly the same way. And, finally, the bill as passed by the assembly, provided exactly the same thing. And now for the time on no revealed recommendation and without any responsible authority to back it up, the Senate has arbitrarily struck this provision from the bill and has amended it by actually naming five individuals.

"The action of the senate is in direct contravention of the law of 1930, is directly opposed to the report of the commissioners, and is directly opposed to the action of the assembly which accepted the appointing power of the Governor.

"Furthermore, I want to make it perfectly plain that this great project for the power development of the St. Lawrence falls very distinctly and definitely within the executive power. A principle is involved which I hoped was settled forever in this State by the constitutional convention, that executive responsibility must be armed with executive authority. The Governor is an important and integral part of the whole plan. No contract can be awarded without his approval; no project, no financing can even be started until the Governor has so approved. In addition the Governor must at all times be in close touch and sympathy with the trustees, not only in facilitating their work in connection with the drawing up of proposed contracts but also in assisting them in their relations with the Federal Government, the Canadian Government, and the government of the Province of Ontario.

"I am convinced that this action is dictated by forces which have prevented the development of water power on the St. Lawrence for the last generation. I am convinced that Republican leaders in and outside the legislature have realized that this movement toward the public development of water power is, from their viewpoint, dangerously near to achievement. They knew that I would refuse to accept an amendment to the bill taking the power of appointment out and naming the individuals, even if it necessitated a veto. The conclusion is irresistible that this action was taken purely to hamstring, hinder, and stop the power development.

"I must decline to divest either the present Governor or any future Governor of his executive authority and responsibility toward this great project. I am confident that sober second thought will persuade the legislature to restore the bill to the original form of the law of 1930, to the original form of the report of the commission, and to the original form in which it passed the assembly."

A hopeless deadlock seemed in prospect when Governor Roosevelt, after a sharp public exchange with the majority leader of the senate, immediately announced his intention of going on the radio to appeal directly to the people in his fight against "the decision of the senate Republican leadership to attempt to dictate the membership" of the proposed power authority.

The Governor's announcement that he would speak over the radio on April 7, 1931, was given out 4 days before that date. During those 4 days messages, telegrams, and letters poured in upon members of the senate and senate leaders in support of the Governor's position. As a result a move to press the bill in the form unsatisfactory to Mr. Roosevelt was defeated in the senate a few hours before he was scheduled to speak.

Notwithstanding this settlement of the controversy, Governor Roosevelt kept his radio engagement and spoke as follows:

"I want to talk to you very briefly tonight about the influence of public opinion on great questions of State policy, and I will use as an illustration an episode that has occurred in Albany during the past 10 days.

"Since last Thursday, when I decided to make a frank appeal to the people of our State to help me save the St. Lawrence water power project, the crisis itself seems to have been averted. This afternoon I am happy to say that the State senate has refused to pass the restrictive amendment proposed by Senator Knight, and there now seems no good reason why the power authority bill should not become law within a very short time. I feel very strongly that this result is due in large part to the wave of protest which swept over the State from north to south and from east to west immediately following the announcement by the Republican senate leaders last Thursday that they had amended the power bill in a way which they knew definitely would of necessity compel its veto by the Governor. The great majority of the newspapers of the State, regardless of party, understood not only that the attempt to deprive the Governor of the power of appointing the trustees for the St. Lawrence development was merely another of a long series of political tricks, but also that it was contrary to the law passed last year, contrary to the recommendation of the investigating commission, and contrary to the bill as it passed the assembly a week ago. Will you let me for a few minutes describe very briefly the existing situation in regard to the St. Lawrence power development?

"You are all familiar with the fact that over 20 years ago the legislature literally gave away for nothing to the Aluminum Co. of America the title of the State in the bed and waters of the St. Lawrence River; that this action was rescinded and annulled by a subsequent legislature on the ground that the Aluminum Co. had done nothing to use their special franchise. At about that time, 20 years ago, a growing body of public opinion began to oppose any private development of a tremendously valuable property right owned by the people of the State. In the early years of Governor Smith's term a desperate effort was made by the power companies and the Aluminum Co. to get the State to turn the St. Lawrence sites over to them on a so-called "50-year lease." Governor Smith made it perfectly clear at that time that a 50-year lease was in practical effect an outright gift, and that the State would never in all human probability get its own property back again. He tried in vain for many years to get the legislature to approve of the development of the site through what is known as an 'authority'—in other words, a quasi-public corporation created by the State to build a dam and a power house, and with the right to finance the project by selling bonds, thus avoiding any direct cost to the taxpayers or the State treasury.

"During my first year in office I begged the legislature for the same thing, plus the policy of assuring cheaper power and electric light to consumers by having the State authority sell the power under what is known as the 'contract method'—in other words, a system of transmission and distribution guaranteeing fair rates to the consumer; together with the further proviso that if no satisfactory contracts could be made with existing power companies, the State ought to evolve some other plan for transmission and distribution to the consumer.

"Last year toward the close of the 1930 session the Republican leaders turned a complete somersault. Public opinion had made itself felt in no uncertain terms and the real reason for the somersault was the fear on the part of the Republican leaders that they would be placed at a very definite disadvantage in the forthcoming governorship campaign. They passed a bill giving me the authority to name an investigating commission to study the whole project and that commission made its favorable report in February of this year.

"That report proved the engineering feasibility of the project at a cost much below the estimate and recommended in favor of creating the power authority for the purpose of building the dam and the power house and, further, to try to make contracts for the transmission and distribution of the power on the basis of the lowest possible rates to the consumer compatible with a fair return on the actual investment of the private distributing companies. No contract could go into effect until after public hearings and until after it had been approved by the Governor. Thus a double safeguard for the public was created.

"The responsibility of the Governor was twofold: First, as the head of the executive department, for the naming of the power trustees, and secondly, his veto or approval of any proposed contracts.

"In this form the assembly a week ago passed the bill creating the power authority and everything looked like smooth sailing until it was reported out by the senate committee with a surprising amendment taking the appointing power away from the Governor and naming five individuals as trustees. The only reason for this amendment was the fact that they knew I would veto the whole bill in its altered form, and they thus hoped to pigeonhole and obstruct this whole project for another year. Of course it goes without saying that the question of the personality of the trustees has not entered and does not enter into the discussion at all. I shall give no consideration to who should be trustees until after the bill has been signed and becomes law. It is, of course, well to bear in mind the fact that the functions of the power trustees are very different from those of the investigation commission, which studied the plans and reported during the past year.

"With the passage of this bill and its signature by me, the State of New York enters into the definite first phase for the development of the St. Lawrence through a governmental agency.

"Three tasks will confront the new trustees: First, to complete and perfect the engineering plans; secondly, to try to make contracts for transmission and distribution with existing or new private companies; third, to negotiate with the Federal Government and with the Canadian authorities. On this latter point I can only say that I hope that there will be no political or administrative obstruction in Washington; and the State of New York must very properly make its plans so as to interfere in no possible way with the present or future navigation of the St. Lawrence River. The State of New York has no desire selfishly to block either our Federal Government or the Canadian Government in any development of the St. Lawrence which they may mutually agree on. There is, therefore, no real reason for obstruction in Washington.

"The bill further distinctly provides that if the power trustees are unable to bring about a contract or contracts satisfactory to them and to the Governor, with private companies, for transmission and distribution, then the trustees must report to the legislature some other plan, if practicable, for either transmission or distribution, or both, which may involve the erection of transmission lines by the authority itself. To my mind the other great keynote which is struck by the present bill is the solemn declaration of principle that the primary purpose of this St. Lawrence development is not merely for big industrial purposes but is essentially for the providing of cheaper electricity and better facilities for distribution of electricity to the householders and small users as broadly as possible through the State.

"From the very beginning I have held to a consistent course and a consistent objective. I have fought all along for development of this power by an agency of the State itself and not by any private corporation. Furthermore, I have fought from the very beginning for the use and distribution of this power for the great purposes of bringing more and cheaper electricity into the homes of the State, into the small shops and small industries, into the farms and into the flats. I am grateful for the fact that there has been such a splendid response from every corner of the State to this policy, for without that response it is clear that it would not have had a chance of going through the legislature. The influence of a handful of political leaders is strong and so is the influence of private corporations when they see an opportunity to get something for nothing; but stronger than all of these put together is the influence of Mr. and Mrs. Average Voter. It may take a good many years to translate this influence of the people of the State into terms of law, but public opinion when it understands a policy and supports it is bound to win in the long run."

Shortly thereafter, as one of the last actions of this session, the senate passed the power authority bill unanimously. It became law with the signature of Governor Roosevelt, affixed on April 27, 1931.

Announcement of the appointment of the five trustees was made on May 6, 1931. They proceeded to organize immediately, with Frank P. Walsh, of New York City, as chairman.

The power authority had been functioning only a month when Governor Roosevelt, informed that negotiations between the Federal Government and Canada were about to be resumed with the objective of negotiating a St. Lawrence treaty, addressed a communication to the President of the United States. The letter follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Albany, June 11, 1931.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: While I have no official advices, I hear that soon you are to appoint the American Plenipotentiaries to negotiate with Canada a St. Lawrence Waterways Treaty.

As you know, the State of New York has undertaken the power development of the New York State side of the international section of the St. Lawrence River through a power authority. In accordance with the act of the legislature, I have appointed the trustees of this authority as follows: Hon. Frank P. Walsh, Prof. James C. Bonbright, Mr. Fred Freestone, Mr. Morris Llewellyn Cooke, and Mr. Delos M. Cosgrove.

With the unanimous approval of the members of the authority, I am making the suggestion that it would be fitting if you would appoint Mr. Delos M. Cosgrove as a member of the treaty commission. I am informed that you have already given favorable consideration to the representation of the State of New York on the commission.

Mr. Cosgrove is a leading citizen of Watertown, N.Y., is intimately acquainted with northern New York and Ontario, and is familiar with the history and the problems of the St. Lawrence River, both in its navigational and power aspects.

I am certain that there are no problems relating to the development of this great project in the interest of commerce and domestic welfare which cannot easily be solved by the mutual cooperation of the Governments of the United States and the State of New York working in conjunction with our Canadian neighbors.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

The power authority entered upon a series of informal conferences and negotiations with representatives of the State Department in Washington looking to agreement as to the share of cost New York should assume in the St. Lawrence development and to the safeguarding of its power resources in the river. As a result of these preliminary conferences, Chairman Walsh of the power authority communicated certain information to Governor Roosevelt who in turn wrote to President Hoover, under date of August 11, 1931, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Albany, August 11, 1931.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Referring to my letter to you on June 11, 1931, which was acknowledged by the Secretary to the President under date of June 20, 1931, I beg to advise you that I have received the following letter from the Power Authority of the State of New York:

"HON. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
"Governor, Executive Chamber, Albany, N.Y.

"SIR: In your letter to the President under date of June 11, 1931, you requested him to appoint as a member of the proposed treaty commission with Canada Mr. Delos M. Cosgrove, vice chairman of the Power Authority of the State of New York.

"This letter we understand was acknowledged by the secretary to the President under date of June 20, 1931.

"Since that date members of the power authority have held informal conversations in Canada looking to the furthering of plans for a dam in the international section of the St. Lawrence River.

"In these conversations it was made apparent that the Governments of the United States and the Dominion of Canada are considering the abandonment of the appointment of treaty commissioners and the substitution therefor of direct negotiations through diplomatic channels alone between the Federal Governments of the two countries looking to the drafting of a treaty.

"These advices seem borne out by statements in the Canadian and American press.

"May we again call your attention to the vital importance that the State of New York be represented in the negotiations with Canada and that this right is recognized in the fourth conclusion of the report of the United States-St. Lawrence Commission upon the development of shipway from the Great Lakes to the sea, submitted by President Hoover, at that time Secretary of Commerce and chairman of the Commission, of December 27, 1926, which reads as follows:

"'That negotiations should be entered into with Canada in an endeavor to arrive at agreements on all these subjects. In such negotiations the United States should recognize the proper relations of New York to the power development in the international section.'

"This principle was reiterated on other occasions by Chairman Hoover. Therefore, may we request that, as this whole question involves relationships between the State of New York and the United States Government, you obtain for us, if possible, direct and early information regarding the negotiations between Washington and Ottawa.

"We must repeat with definite emphasis that we adhere to the belief that a representative of New York should take part in the negotiations in view of the fact that State-owned power development is equally involved with the navigation plans of the Federal Government.

"Very respectfully,

"FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman."

In view of this whole matter, in which I concur, I would greatly appreciate it if you would be good enough to advise me of the status of the negotiations between the United States and Canada relating to drafting of a treaty covering the development of the St. Lawrence River in the international section for navigation and power purposes.

I am, my dear Mr. President, faithfully yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, Governor.

The conferences and negotiations between the State Department and other representatives of the Federal Government and the power authority continued to the end of 1931. During this period Governor Roosevelt was kept informed of developments, although no overt action was taken by him.

On the last day of this year the power authority made an interim report to the Governor, in which it was stated that progress was being made toward an understanding with Federal authorities. In this report certain recommendations were made to the Governor, including a proposal for legislation to permit municipalities in New York to purchase and distribute St. Lawrence power, after referendum of their citizens.

It may also be noted that in the late summer of this year Governor Roosevelt joined with the trustees of the power authority in an inspection trip of sections of the St. Lawrence River, in which the proposed development would be made.

GOVERNOR FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT AND THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER PROJECT FOR THE YEAR 1932

Entering upon his fourth year in office, Governor Roosevelt informed the legislature, in his annual message, dated January 6, 1932, that the trustees of the power authority were making progress toward development of the St. Lawrence power resources. He again pointed out the necessity for enactment of legislation permitting municipalities to generate and distribute electricity, being supported by recommendations of the power authority. His references in this message were as follows:

"The power authority, created last year, has made definite progress in the performance of the duties imposed upon it by law, not only in working out the respective rights and interests of the four parties principally concerned, namely, United States, Canada, Province of Ontario, and the State of New York, but also in a further study of the economic and engineering problems and in negotiation of contracts for power distribution.

"In conjunction with the mandate placed upon it by section 5 of chapter 772 of the Laws of 1931, directing it to provide a reasonable share of the power to be generated on the St. Lawrence for the use of municipalities and other political subdivisions of the State now or hereafter authorized by law to engage in the distribution of electricity, I desire to recommend to your honorable bodies the adoption of a statute similar to the one which was proposed by me last year, but which failed of adoption, authorizing municipalities of the State to form public utility districts, with the consent of their voters, for the purpose of generating, distributing, and selling electricity."

Governor Roosevelt followed this request with a special message to the legislature, dated February 15, 1932, in which he again emphasized the necessity for legislation enabling municipalities which might desire to do so, to buy St. Lawrence power when it was ready for marketing. In this message he said:

"The intermediate report of the power authority points out the necessity of early adoption of legislation which will permit municipalities to buy the cheap electrical power to be developed from the St. Lawrence. In connection with this, one or more municipalities should also be enabled by law to combine into a utility district for this purpose. It is equally important that municipalities, acting either for themselves or in conjunction with other municipalities or parts thereof, should have the right, on the approval of a majority of the voters in the region affected, to manufacture, transmit and distribute electrical energy.

"Last year there were introduced in the legislature two bills to carry out this purpose. They were not passed. Nor indeed were they given any adequate consideration. I am causing legislation to this end again to be introduced and trust that your honorable bodies will adopt it so as to permit municipalities to help reduce rates for electricity for their inhabitants. A number of municipalities in the State now have this right; and it is common knowledge that the rates for electrical energy are much cheaper in those localities than elsewhere.

"There can be no valid objection to this legislation, except from those utility corporations which seek to maintain as exorbitant rates as possible. If there are details of the proposed legislation which do not meet with the views of your honorable bodies, I shall be glad to confer with you relative to amendments, providing only they do not change the general principle of the program. I believe that it is particularly important that this policy be written now into the statute law of our State in order more adequately and more quickly to obtain all of the benefits of the development of the St. Lawrence water power toward which the power authority has made marked progress."

The legislature adjourned without having taken action on the Governor's proposals.

Subsequently, early in July, Mr. Roosevelt became the Democratic nominee for the Presidency. During this immediate period it became apparent that the negotiations for a treaty with Canada were rapidly approaching a conclusion. Inasmuch as an agreement between Federal authorities and the power authority had not been reached, Governor Roosevelt, after a conference with the trustees of the power authority at his Hyde Park home, sent the following telegram to President Hoover under date of July 9, 1932:

The PRESIDENT,

The White House, Washington, D.C.:

The Power Authority of the State of New York has officially reported to me the status of its negotiations with the State Department in the matter of effecting an agreement between the Federal administration and the State of New York in connection with the development of the St. Lawrence River for navigation and power.

According to this report, after many protracted conferences between the State Department and the New York State Power Authority over a period of many months, the Secretary of State has referred the issues to you for final determination.

The question, failure to agree upon which has prevented complete accord, is the proportion of the cost to be borne by the State of New York.

I am sure that you agree with me that prompt and speedy settlement of this only question remaining unsettled is a matter of vital necessity. It is a vital necessity for the simple fact that this great project involves two objectives of equal importance and cannot in public justice accomplish one without the other.

I am deeply interested in the immediate construction of the deep waterway as well as in the development of abundant and cheap power.

The State of New York not only owns this potential power but seeks, through a State agency, to make it available to millions of people at reasonable cost.

That is why the determination of the share of the total cost of construction to be paid for by this State is a present factor which should not be relegated to later negotiations between us.

Four sovereignties are involved: The Dominion of Canada and the Province of Ontario, the United States and the State of New York.

In Canada the Premier of Canada and the Premier of Ontario have directly conducted negotiations on this very subject.

In international matters affecting the joint rights and interests of the United States Government and one or more of its sovereign States, an understanding should be reached between the Federal and State Governments as a condition precedent to the conclusion of negotiations with a foreign nation.

In view of this, therefore, it is my belief that through a personal conference between us this could be promptly solved.

With such an agreement between the Federal administration and the State of New York, it would be my hope that it would be possible to submit a treaty to the Senate for immediate and, I hope, favorable action as soon as signed.

May I respectfully point out that such action would hasten greatly the initiation of this vast project—one which means cheap transportation by deep waterway for the agricultural and other products of the West; cheap electricity from the State-owned and controlled resource, to be developed for the primary interest of homes, farms, and industries; and, of immediate importance, employment for thousands of workers.

If, by thus cutting red tape and eliminating formalities, we could work together to secure early and final action on this great public work, it would be greatly to the public interest. It has already been too long delayed.

I hold myself subject to your call and am ready to go to Washington on 48 hours' notice at your convenience.

I shall be on a cruise between New York and Cape Cod this week, but will be in port each night. Word to Albany will be forwarded promptly.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
Governor of New York.

Shortly thereafter, on July 18, 1932, the St. Lawrence Treaty with Canada was signed in Washington.

During the presidential campaign, Governor Roosevelt touched on the St. Lawrence project in the course of his address on public utilities in Portland, Oreg., on September 21, 1932, as follows:

"Let me repeat the position which I took in my first inaugural address as Governor of New York, January 1, 1929, and which I have maintained ever since. I said then and I say now:

"'The water power of the State should belong to all the people. The title to this power must rest forever in the people. No commission—not the legislature itself—has any right to give, for any consideration whatever, a single potential kilowatt in vital perpetuity to any person or corporation whatever. It is the duty of our representative bodies to see that this power is transferred into usable electrical energy and distributed at the lowest possible cost. It is our power, and no inordinate profits must be allowed to those who act as the people's agent in bringing this power to their homes and workshops.'"

In the same address, speaking of the development of the water power of the Columbia River in the Northwest, he added:

"This vast water power can be of incalculable value to this whole section of the country. It means cheap manufacturing production, economy, and comfort on the farm and in the household. Your problem with regard to this great power is similar to our problem in the State of New York with regard to the power development of the St. Lawrence River.

"Here you have the clear picture of four great Government power developments in the United States—the St. Lawrence River in the Northeast, Muscle Shoals in the Southeast, the Boulder Dam project in the Southwest, and, finally, but by no means the least of them, the Columbia River in the Northwest. Each one of these will be forever a national yardstick to prevent extortion against the public and to encourage the wider use of that servant of the people—electricity."

After the legislature had adjourned, Governor Roosevelt visited St. Paul, Minn., to address a large gathering on the occasion of a Jefferson Day dinner. Speaking on April 18, 1932, he made the following reference to the St. Lawrence project:

"Let me illustrate by telling you simply and briefly the story of the long fight which I have had in the State of New York for making available for the use of the public of the State a million and one fourth horsepower provided by nature and capable of development at an exceedingly low price on the St. Lawrence River.

"There is no doubt that because the people of the State have always owned the bed of the St. Lawrence River out to the international boundary, the people of the State and no private corporations have the definite right to build the necessary dam or dams to develop the power. Twenty-five years ago, when the people of the State were little aware of their great heritage, a legislature attempted to alienate this great possession to the Aluminum Co. of America. This was happily frustrated and then began a 20-year struggle to prevent a new alienation of this great possession under the guise of a lease running for 50 years or more. In this contest my distinguished predecessor, Governor Smith, was happily able to prevent the control from passing out of the hands of the State. When I took office I undertook at once a definite plan for the development of this great power and I laid down a very definite application of the principle to which I have alluded. In order to be absolutely certain that the actual possession of the power itself should never be alienated from the people I insisted that the actual dam or dams and the actual power houses should be constructed by a public authority and always remain in the physical possession of that public authority. Then came the question of how and under what terms this power should be distributed to the actual consuming public. I laid down the principle that this task of transmission and of distribution should be offered in the first instance to private capital and private management, but under very definite terms. These terms were intended to carry out the purpose of getting the electricity into the homes of the people at the lowest reasonable price. This price would be made up of the following items: First, a payment to the State at the power house of an amount necessary to pay the interest and amortization on the cost of the plant; secondly, an item representing the actual cost of transmission and a reasonable return on the actual money wisely and necessarily invested in transmission lines; and third, the cost of distribution plus a reasonable return on the amount wisely and necessarily invested in the properties engaged in distribution. The sum of these three items would represent the actual cost of electricity to the home owner, and we have believed that this cost would be far below the average price now charged to the home owners of the State. The very definite plan has been to invite private capital to contract with the State to do this transmitting and distribution on these entirely proper and reasonable terms. But at that point it became necessary to provide an alternative in the event that private capital was unwilling to undertake transmission and distribution on terms involving only a reasonable profit to that private capital. I said in my message to the legislature at that time, 'Are the business men of this State willing to transmit and distribute this latent water power on a fair return on their investment? If they are satisfied, here is their opportunity. If not, then the State may have to go into the transmission business itself.' That is the obvious development of any sound government control over private utilities—that government itself should not engage in the utility business if it can find private initiative and private capital willing to undertake the business for a reasonable and fair return on the capital which it is necessary and wise to invest in the project—and on the other hand, if government is not able to find private individuals or corporations willing to do this, then government must step in and do it itself."

Referring to the interest of the West in the navigation features of the development and the interest of New York in the development of cheap power, Governor Roosevelt labeled these projects "twin sisters."

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT AND THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER PROJECT, 1933–34

Throughout the year 1933 President Roosevelt continued his advocacy of the development of the St. Lawrence River under the pending treaty with Canada to insure the benefits of this project to the American people for power and navigation purposes.

On June 8, 1933, the President made public a statement urging adoption of the resolution which had passed the House providing for allocation of Federal and State costs under the treaty to insure public development of St. Lawrence power, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 8, 1933.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr.,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I do not hesitate to tell you—and I do so with complete consistency—that I favor the resolution relating to the St. Lawrence power development passed by the House. I also favor the ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty.

The joint resolution protects the people of the State of New York who own the land under water in the St. Lawrence River as far out as the international boundary. The resolution means, in effect, that the Congress will see to it that the State of New York, in paying for the power part of the development, will pay only for that part and will thus be able to insure cheap electricity for the consuming public.

The treaty itself has been endorsed by both major political parties. The beginning of the work of construction at an early date can be made an essential part of the national Public Works program and will furnish employment to thousands of people.

The above are simple facts and I have no objection to your use of this letter if you so desire.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

On September 16, 1933, Secretary of War Dern, at the request of the President, addressed the St. Lawrence Seaway Conference, at Superior, Wis. Secretary Dern stated in this address:

"The President favors ratification of the treaty in its existing form. He has made this public in several conferences with Senators and notably in a letter to Senator La Follette. He has authorized me to repeat to you today that he hopes the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty will be ratified, and that the project will be constructed."

Following a conference at the White House with Chairman Frank P. Walsh of the power authority of the State of New York, on September 14, 1933, the President announced the formation of an interdepartmental board to make an economic study of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project, in all its aspects, including both navigation and power development.

On January 10, 1934, the President submitted his message to the Senate, asking ratification of the pending treaty and submitting a summary of the interdepartmental reports on the project. (The message is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 10, and the accompanying summary in the RECORD of January 11.)

Mr. LEWIS subsequently said: Mr. President, while I was called out of the Chamber for a few minutes, the able Senator from Nevada, Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee [Mr. PITTMAN], brought to the attention of the Senate some documentary matter which he feels makes some reply to some of the positions I took in my opening speech against the treaty. I will not allude now in detail to the presentation of the Senator from Nevada, in view of the fact that the leader of the majority desires to have the Senate proceed with the consideration of the executive calendar, but I merely give notice that I will, on tomorrow, refer to the matter alluded to by the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and which he presented to the Senate touching what is known as the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty.

CORPORATION INCOME-TAX LAWS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am going to occupy briefly the time of the Senate this afternoon to discuss the corporation income-tax laws that we now have, and some proposed amendments to them.

Our income taxes started, as we know, the last time about 1913. Our income-tax laws were largely framed by the present Secretary of State, the Honorable Cordell Hull, from my State. They were ably framed; they were carefully framed; and, as long as they were adhered to, they brought in very excellent returns to the American Government. Secretary Hull, then Congressman Hull, was a great student of taxation, and a student of government generally, and he molded a system of income taxation which did him and his country great credit.

Those laws in the last 12 years, however, have been so emasculated, they have been so changed, there have been so many amendments thereto permitting so many deductions and allowances and credits to favored classes that now I am quite sure Secretary Hull would not recognize his own income tax laws.

The Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives has before it now, I believe, some additional proposed changes in the income-tax laws. The Finance Committee of the Senate will soon have to pass upon those changes. At this time I desire to call the especial attention of the members of those two committees—and all other House Members and the Senate Members as well—to some of the peculiar amendments that have been offered to this law in the past 12 years.

The income-tax laws—both the corporation income-tax laws and the individual income-tax laws—worked well for many years. Then in 1921, when our Republican friends came into control of the Government, one of the first things they undertook to do was to secure an amelioration of those laws. Not only that, they have tried to destroy those laws. The Republican Party, as a party, was never in favor of income-tax laws. It sought to break them down and bring them in disrepute from the very beginning. It would infinitely prefer a sales tax, taking the tax burdens off of those best able to bear them and placing them on those less able to bear them.

Mr. President, I have here a table that I ask at this time to have made a part of my remarks. It is a table comparing the deductions made by Republican administrations during their last tenure of power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

TABLE No. 1.—Table comparing certain deductions of corporations (all corporations) for the years 1921 to 1930, inclusive, showing increased amounts allowed in computing taxable net income under the Revenue Acts of 1921, 1924, 1926, 1928

[Source: Treasury Department Statistics of Income, except as otherwise indicated]

Year	Compensation of officers	Depreciation, etc.	Depletion	Prior-year net loss	Tax-exempt dividends and interest	Miscellaneous deductions	Total of preceding deductions	Increase in items specified over 1921	Net income of corporations reporting net income	Income tax paid

Mr. McKELLAR. This table shows a very remarkable situation, and explains very fully why the amounts that the American Government gets from corporation income taxes is the pitifully small sum that we now secure from that source.

It has been made to appear by the newspapers of the land, and by other propaganda going out, that our income-tax laws are a failure, and that we must resort to some other method of taxation. I say that if there is any trouble with the income-tax laws it is the trouble that has been brought about by the Congress of the United States while in Republican hands in constantly changing the income-tax laws in favor of the big corporations, which should pay those taxes.

I have called attention to this table which I have already submitted, and I am going to take just one of the years as an example of all. This table is a table of the taxes for the 10 years beginning in 1921 and ending in 1930. I will take the year 1930, and I desire to call attention especially to the deductions that are now allowed to be made.

Compensation of officers, $3,138,845,973.

Depreciation, $3,986,208,883.

Depletion, $463,015,786.

Prior year net loss, $157,880,249.

Tax-exempt dividends and interest, $3,107,491,324.

Miscellaneous deductions, $39,897,670,077.

Total of the deductions, $50,751,112,292.

But, Mr. President, after all those deductions are made, the Congress in 1921 passed a law permitting very material additions to these deductions. These additions brought about by amendments by 1930 had reached the enormous total of $118,956,662,439.

It may be said that these figures are tiresome; that they do not indicate what the true facts are; but they do, while they are tiresome to listen to, demonstrate the facts, Mr. President. Let us see what they indicate. We tax corporations, as shown by these figures, only on an infinitesimal amount of their net earnings. The deductions I have just read come after all the costs and all the other allowances are made; but the allowances to which I call particular attention are additional allowances that have been made by the Congress between 1921 and 1930. So the result is that during the 10-year period of which I speak there were taxes imposed on $81,047,451,098, while the deductions alone that have been added by the Republican Party during the same period amounted to the enormous sum of $118,956,662,439.

In other words, Mr. President, due to acts of Congress of 1921, 1924, 1926, and 1928 our Republican friends have more than cut in two the net taxable income of corporations. They have deprived the American people of any tax on $118,000,000,000 of net income of corporations alone. If they had not added all the deductions and allowances in the interest of the favored classes there would not be much need of our borrowing so much money now, and no need at all of raising additional taxes from those less able to pay them.

Mr. President, can we wonder that the income taxes actually received from corporations during all that time have gone down? We did not have to wait for a depression. The favored interests got theirs by deduction, by allowances. And how did they get it? Let me call the attention of the Senate to how it has been done. It has been done principally through lobbyists.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate and the attention of the country to the cumbersome method of assessing and collecting these taxes, the cumbersome language that is employed by which these taxes are assessed and collected. Does the act provide plain language? Not at all. I call the attention of the Senate to some of the language that the Senate has endorsed in the imposition of these taxes. I quote from the act of 1928, page 822, section 115 of the Revenue Statutes, under the subtitle of—

Distribution by corporations—(a) Definition of dividend: The term "dividend" when used in this title (except in sec. 203 (a) (4) and sec. 208 (c) (1), relating to insurance companies) means any distribution made by a corporation to its shareholders, whether in money or in other property, out of its earnings or profits accumulated after February 28, 1913.

If that is not as clear as mud, then there is no way in the world for mental ingenuity to confuse language. I do not mean to say it has not a meaning. It has. Those interested in the use of that language knew exactly what they were doing when they put that language in the bill. It meant deductions; it meant allowances; it meant gratuities to favored interests. That is what it meant. We all know it. None will dispute it.

I call the attention of the Senate to another quotation. I quote probably the most cunningly devised and remarkable piece of language in all our law. I quote from subsection (c) of the same section, on the same page:

Distribution in liquidation: Amounts distributed in complete liquidation of a corporation shall be treated as in full payment in exchange for the stock, and amounts distributed in partial liquidation of a corporation shall be treated as in part or full payment in exchange for stock.

I stop long enough to ask what possible sense could be made out of such language? Just think of legislators passing such language as that in any bill.

But I continue:

The gain or loss to the distributee resulting from such exchange shall be determined under section 111, but shall be recognized only to the extent provided in section 112. In the case of amounts distributed in partial liquidation (other than a distribution within the provisions of sec. 112 (h) of stock or securities in connection with a reorganization), the part of such distribution which is properly chargeable to capital account shall not be considered a distribution of earnings or profits within the meaning of subsection (b) of this section for the purpose of determining the taxability of subsequent distributions by the corporation.

Mr. President, after reading this language, which is just one of the subsections of this most involved law, can any one wonder that there are 241,616 corporations paying a billion and a half dollars of dividends to their stockholders, and yet not paying one cent of taxes to their Government?

I ask Senators who are listening to me to think of this for a moment. There are something over 500,000 corporations in this country. In the year 1930, which I will give as an illustration, 221,000 made returns showing that they owed some taxes, each one of them. Two hundred and forty-one thousand, in round numbers, showed deficiencies; and those 241,000 corporations showing nearly $4,000,000,000 of deficiencies declared one and a half billion dollars of dividends to their stockholders. By the peculiar machinations of language which exist in this bill, not only the billion and a half dollars did not pay any income tax, but the dividends which the corporations declared were not taxable in the hands of the individuals that received them.

Not only that, Mr. President, but many, many people of wealth, instead of paying individual income taxes, where the surtaxes were estimated to be large, formed more or less dummy corporations, transferred their properties to such corporations, and then, by way of deductions and allowances, escaped large sums of taxation by reason of the smaller corporation rate. I am informed that many of these dummy tax corporations are still in existence. Their only purpose is to escape and evade taxation. The Congress should amend the corporation tax law so as to prevent these people from evading and setting at naught the individual income tax law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. KING. For information, I inquire of the Senator whether those dividends or any part of them were paid out of earnings for the year or years in which they were declared; or were they paid from reserves growing out of prior activities of the companies?

May I further observe that, as the Senator knows, many of the corporations—I think unwisely, and certainly unjustly, and in part for the purpose of evading taxes—maintained very large reserves, and then at the psychological moment they would declare dividends, perhaps in some year when they had losses or had very small profits, and thus escape paying taxes; and for that reason the Senator may recall that the late Senator Jones and I offered a bill to compel distribution of the larger part of those reserves, or subject them to taxation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call the Senator's especial attention to table 2, which I shall now ask to be made a part of my remarks; and I will ask him to give it his careful attention when reading the RECORD tomorrow morning, if he will. I think this table will answer his question fully. I am going to answer it in a moment, after the Chair permits it to be placed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. McKELLAR. I will take the year 1930 for the purpose of answering the Senator's question. In that year we had 518,736 corporations in America. Two hundred and twenty-one thousand four hundred and twenty of those corporations showed net taxable income. Two hundred and forty-one thousand six hundred and sixteen showed no net taxable income.

Returns showing net income amounted to $91,811,495,003.

Returns showing no net income amounted to $46,500,564,065.

Returns showing taxable income were $6,420,000,000.

The other 241,000 corporations, instead of showing incomes, showed $4,878,000,000 which they called deficits; but the same 241,616 corporations which showed a total deficit of nearly $5,000,000,000 actually paid out as dividends to their stockholders the enormous sum of $1,500,000,000! And mostly in cash.

How do they do it? It is the plainest thing in the world. All one has to do is to read the act of 1921, which amended the previous corporation revenue act. That act did not go into effect in time to show the additional deductions for 1921, but the next year it showed additional deductions of $605,000,000; the next year, 1923, it showed additional deductions and allowances made largely to this class of corporations of $4,646,098,956; the next year the amount was $3,572,462,770; and the next year the additional deductions amounted to $9,043,277,114.

Mr. LONG. Million dollars?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; $9,000,000,000 of additional deductions. The table I am now reading from shows only the deductions. The next year the amount was $16,983,990,389; the next year it was $17,917,178,272; the next year it was $21,843,802,174; the next year it was $23,619,503,312; and the next year, 1930, it was $20,724,873,792. In all, the gigantic sum of $84,047,451,098, which escaped all taxation by reason of the increased deductions and allowances given after our Republican friends secured control of the Government in 1921.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. How much did they start with? They seem to have been able to get up to $20,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not the exact figures, but the gross income of corporations during that period amounted approximately to well over $100,000,000,000 a year; the cost of doing business was 50 percent, and that was deducted; then all these other deductions were added by law; and then all these other superdeductions were added by the Republican Party when they came in, with the result that, because of amendments made to the revenue law during the Harding, the Coolidge, and the Hoover administrations, the provisions requiring a fair and just income tax, both of corporations and of individuals have been absolutely emasculated. That is why we see published in the newspapers items to the effect that the income tax law has fallen down. That is not true. What has been done is, we have yielded to the emissaries of the favored interests, to the lobbyists, if you please, who come here every year, who, I am informed, are here now, seeking to change the income-tax provisions in favor of the great interests which they represent.

The purpose of my making these remarks this afternoon, Mr. President, is to urge the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate not to let these "jokers" made for the favored interests creep into the law. We could allow all proper deductions in the income tax law, and yet from the two sources, the corporation income tax and the individual income tax, there could be derived ample revenue to run the Government, without injustice to anyone, and without undue burden upon those who are able to pay and who ought to pay.

Mr. President, I have been talking about two features of the law; one is the exemption of a billion and a half dollars paid out in dividends by corporations which had made so much money that they could pay such dividends in 1 year, every dollar of which escaped taxation under the laws which I have mentioned. The other thing to which I have called attention is the fact, well known to us all, that corporations have secured these deductions through frequent amendments of the law. Every 2 years we have such amendments offered, and the corporations as a result get off with the payment of less and less taxes. Mr. President, it is not fair to that class of corporations that pay taxes for another vast body of corporations that make money not to pay taxes. That is not the way for a government to tax its people. It is not right that certain corporations can send representatives here and secure "jokers" put in bills by reference to other bills and other sections and other laws and thus obtain great gratuities from the Government, while the great body of self-respecting corporations pay their taxes. It is not fair to the other corporations; it is not fair to the individual taxpayer; it is not fair to the Government and it is not fair to the country as a whole to have such tax laws; and I am here this afternoon to ask the Finance Committee of the Senate to take into consideration this vast amount of net income—net income after making the most generous allowances and deductions that any government ever gave—and to require corporations which earned dividends and paid them out to pay their just proportion of the taxes.

Mr. President, I come to another feature of the method and practice of the favored interests in escaping taxation and that is what is known as "depletions." I read in the newspapers several days ago that the House committee was going to require that depletions be to some degree taxed, and that depletion allowances be no longer granted to the full extent they have been allowed in the past.

I wish to refer to the history of the depletion allowance to corporations, and when I refer to depletion I am talking specifically about the oil and gas companies. When the income tax law was first enacted it provided that corporations should be exempted on the actual cost of mines or oil wells. Then there was added the provision with regard to discovery value of the mine or well, putting a limitation on the amount of capital drawn from that mine or well. Let us see how it worked. Substantially that worked so as to excuse the great oil companies from paying any corporation income taxes at all until about 1926, when the law was again amended to bring about and did bring about a peculiar result. I am going to take a specific case. Let us suppose a man bought an oil property in 1913—because March 1, 1913, was the date when income taxation started—and that he paid $100,000 in cash for that oil well. Experts fixed the life of that well for, let us say, 5 years, there being a rule by which that is determined. Therefore, under that rule, of course, the well would have gone out in 1918, and $20,000 would be deducted each year, and by that time the capital account would have been exhausted.

A little later on there was added the discovery element. Let us assume that the discovery value was a million dollars. The owner still has the well. It has lasted 5 years. There was first exempted $20,000 a year for 5 years. That worked fine so long as it represented the fixed life of the well; but in 1925 it was found that innumerable oil wells—and the provision applies to other minerals—were still producing oil and that the 5-year limit had passed. They had been escaping taxes all that time, but the 5-year period had passed and the allowance for depletion ended. Then, let us see what our oil friends did. They appeared here and said they wanted an increase in taxes on oil. Mind you, Mr. President, they had gotten all the exemptions to which they were entitled. Suppose an oil company had already produced for the period of 5 years; it was tax free during that time by reason of depletion allowances; but when the 5 years elapsed it would have to pay taxes on its income, because all its capital allowances had been exhausted. So the representatives of the oil companies came here and said, "We want to have our taxes on oil increased; we will do this; we ask that 27½-percent gross and 50-percent net be granted as an allowance hereafter." In other words, that gave the well 2 more years, and they were willing to pay on half, not, like other people who paid on all, but the oil companies, which had virtually escaped taxation all these years, had their life extended indefinitely, and they paid on a 50-percent basis while everybody else paid on a 100-percent basis.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in a moment. It is absolutely inexcusable; it is a "joker" in the law. The oil companies have representatives here all the time; and, by the way, they did not have to have representatives all the time because for about 11 years the Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon, seems to have been on guard; and, of course, we all know it was because of his generosity that after the capital allowances had been exhausted entirely, he was willing they should pay on a 50-percent basis on the oil. To my mind, it is one of the most damnable laws that was ever enacted. Why should oil companies be free from taxation? Why should any particular company, because it has representatives to serve it here at the Capital, be exempted from taxation? I do not believe it ought to be exempted, and I hope the members of the Finance Committee will see to it that the law is properly amended. I now yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have not looked at the first revenue law recently, but I understand it allowed a reduction of 20 percent a year. That was along about 1921 or 1922.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; it was before that; it was in 1913.

Mr. LONG. And the law allowed them to deduct 20 percent a year, did it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Twenty percent a year.

Mr. LONG. After they had deducted five 20's that made a hundred percent; then they come back and deducted 50 percent more; so 150 percent has already been deducted.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is wholly mistaken. By 1926 they had deducted, under the 20 percent law, 100 percent; in 1926 and 1927 another 100 percent; in 1928 and 1929 another 100 percent; in 1930 and 1931 another 100 percent; and in 1932 and 1933 another 100 percent. That makes 500 percent. In other words, these corporations that have their agents here keeping close around the Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee know exactly how to dovetail in some section, as I pointed out a while ago, that refers to another section, and that, in turn, to another subsection, and that, in turn, to another page, and that, in turn, to another book, and that, in turn, to another law, going in and coming out. The ordinary man never knows what it is all about. It is so complicated it is unintelligible to the ordinary man, but when the oil men get down there, they know how to get the exemptions fixed up. They have shown this by results. The present law on depletions amply rewards their ability.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator stated that they deduct 100 percent. What does he mean?

Mr. McKELLAR. It means they have deducted their capital time and time again.

Mr. FESS. One hundred percent?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. FESS. That would be deducting all of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether they have got to the end yet.

Mr. FESS. One hundred percent would be all of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The depletion allowances had been made to the full extent of their capital and were to expire in 1926, but the law was then amended so it would never expire. We ought to repeal this depletion allowance now. Why should we allow a deduction of 50 percent of the net profits of the oil companies unless we make similar allowance for all other companies? What is there in an oil company except that Mr. Rockefeller is the head of one of the biggest, Mr. Mellon is the head of another one of the biggest, Mr. Sinclair is the head of another one, Mr. Doherty the head of another, and innumerable other captains of industry are heads of others? Why give them an exemption of 50 percent of the net profits of the capital account that has already been deducted time and again?

Mr. FESS. What I want to understand is whether the Senator meant that they have deducted all of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; several times over.

Mr. FESS. The Senator said 100 percent this year and 100 percent another year. That would be all of it each year.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Ohio is such an intelligent man that I know that he wants to get it straight. Let me repeat it. Let us suppose a company that had a discovery value in 1918, we will say, of $1,000,000. They were entitled to deduct $200,000 under the law that then existed as a depletion allowance, $200,000 a year for 5 years, that being the average life of an oil well. In 1923 that deduction right ceased under the law as it then existed. Then the Republicans came along and amended the law in 1925 or 1926, and it was applied to the year 1926 so as to continue the deductions for capital, and a change was made providing that they might deduct 27½-percent or 50-percent net thereafter.

Mr. FESS. That would be $270,000 on a $1,000,000 property.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; it has all been deducted up to that time. After that, the well, still producing, was exempted by law to the extent of 50 percent of the net earnings of the well. In 2 years that was 100 percent. In 2 more years it was another 100 percent. In another 2 years it was still another 100 percent, and so on down to the present date.

Mr. FESS. I do not understand that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sorry the Senator does not understand it. I have explained it fully.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. LONG. Inasmuch as both of my colleagues are so much better educated than I am, I think I can put it in sawmill language that the Senator from Ohio will understand.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not know the Senator from Ohio is a sawmill expert. I am glad to know it.

Mr. LONG. In 1913 we had a law that permitted the oil companies to deduct from their earnings 20 percent of the capital as depletion. They deducted that in 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916, and 1917, until five 20-percent deductions meant that they had deducted 100 percent of the total of the capital. There was not anything else to deduct from capital depletion, because the entire capital had all been deducted. Then they came back and amended the law a few years later, under which they deducted 50 percent per year for 2 years, and thus deducted another 100 percent. In 2 more years they did the same thing, and deducted another 100 percent, and so on every 2 years, until my calculation shows that they have actually deducted between 500 and 600 percent of the net capital for depletion and are still deducting.

Mr. FESS. I understand the Senator. It took 5 years to make 100 percent. It would have covered 15 years if they deducted 300 percent.

Mr. LONG. From 1913 to 1917 they took it all off the books. Then they got the law fixed up and deducted another 100 percent in the next 2 years. Then in the following 2 years they deducted another 100 percent, and so on until they deducted 500 percent on those oil properties and are still deducting on capital depletion.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Louisiana are both under a misapprehension as to what took place under the revenue act in respect to oil properties prior to the act of 1918 and subsequent to that act under the act of 1925.

Prior to the act of 1918 oil companies were permitted to deplete and were required to deplete their capital on the basis of cost. If an oil lease cost $1 per acre, that would be $160 in Oklahoma for an oil lease on 160 acres; or if it cost $5 an acre, it would be $800 for 160-acre lease in Oklahoma.

An oil company brought in a producing well on that property, and the oil company, under the law prior to 1918, was permitted and required to deplete on the basis of $800 cost. Depletion was based on cost. Many of the most valuable leases cost a mere nominal sum. In the act of 1918 the basis of depletion was shifted from cost to value.

Mr. McKELLAR. Only discovery value.

Mr. GORE. In respect to discovery value and in respect to discovery property. The Senator from Tennessee should bear in mind that that provision was limited to discovery properties which are very rare and unusual and would be only one property allowed to one concern in one field. That was not a general law applicable to oil-producing properties in a new field.

It was limited to the one company that brought in the discovery well and was limited to the lease upon which the discovery well was located.

Here is the reason back of the law. It was in the interest of the independent companies; it was against the interests of the Standard companies; it was in the interest of the "wildcatter", as he is known in the oil field. A wildcatter goes out and obtains a lease, raises money perhaps to drill a well, and brings in a well on the lease. Under the old law, if the lease cost him $160, his depletion allowance was limited to $160. Under the new law, the act of 1918, he was allowed to have that property valued within 30 days after the discovery and a reasonable valuation placed upon the property, say $500,000 or, if the Senator please, $1,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Or $5,000,000 or $10,000,000.

Mr. GORE. Yes; whatever it was. He was then allowed depletion on the basis of value instead of cost, and this is the reason why. Perhaps a given wildcatter had drilled half a dozen dry wells which amounted to a total loss which could never be recovered. In order to enable the wildcatter and the pioneer to proceed, he was allowed to deplete on the basis of discovery value instead of cost.

I want to give a classic instance in the State of Oklahoma. Mr. MARLAND, who organized the Marland Oil Co. and who is now a prominent Member of the other House of this Congress, obtained a number of leases from the State of Oklahoma, leases of school land belonging to the State. He contracted to drill 20 test wells on 20 different properties. As a matter of fact, he drilled 19 dry holes on 19 different tracts under his leases from the State, which cost him in the aggregate $500,000. The twentieth well produced. At that time, as I remember it, he was still limited to depletion on the basis of cost, and his lease probably cost him $50 and his return of capital was limited to $50, because that was all the capital he had advanced on that particular property.

The philosophy of the new law was that when he brought in the twentieth well, the discovery well, he was allowed to have that property revalued and was allowed to deplete on the basis of value, so that he could recover some compensation or recompense for the $500,000 he had expended on the dry wells. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that the Standard Oil companies do not drill discovery wells. They do not wildcat. They do not pioneer. When a man like MARLAND and other wildcatters go to and fro exploring for oil, spending their capital on dry wells, and when they finally bring in a well, the Standard buys that well in proven territory and continues to operate, assuming practically no risk, but allowing the wildcatter to take the risk. I will say to the Senator that in the State of Oklahoma that one provision saved the lives of half the independent oil companies in the depression of 1920–21. They would have gone to the wall, those having discovery properties, if they had not been allowed to deplete on the basis of value instead of cost. That was of no concern to the Standard Co. because they do not explore and they do not wildcat.

As to subsequent legislation, I am not familiar with that and could not speak without rechecking the enactment; but so far as the original enactment was concerned, it was passed deliberately and of a purpose in behalf of wildcatters and independent concerns. There was no law then and never has been any law providing that one must deplete for 5 years at the rate of 20 percent a year. There is no such law as that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, it is about that. The Department fixes the life of the property, and the depletions are allowed accordingly. There are some parts of the country—I think Oklahoma is one of them—where there are very rich fields, and they are allowed a little longer; but the average is from 5 to 7 years. These depletion allowances on the discovery value, as the Senator says, were enacted in 1918. When 1923 and 1924 came along, the oil people were here in Washington. They were not discovery wells they were trying to get out of taxation, because having exhausted their capital, and not only their capital but the discovery value of their wells under the law, they came along and said, "Well, hereafter we will just allow ourselves to be taxed on 50 percent of our net income"; and that is the way it has been working ever since. Every 2 years they exhaust their capital again, fixed in this remarkable way.

Mr. GORE. But, Mr. President, it is only the capital produced in a given year. The Senator thinks it is the capital for the whole time.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the only thing anybody is taxed on—what he produces in a given year. What I produce in a given year, and what the Senator from Oklahoma produces in a given year, we are taxed on. Why should not the oil companies be taxed in exactly the same way?

Mr. GORE. They are.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; they are not. I have yielded quite a while to my good friend from Oklahoma. I do not blame him for being interested in this matter. He comes from an oil State, and it is perfectly proper for him to be interested in it.

Mr. GORE. One more observation, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator for an observation.

Mr. GORE. The point is this: If the Senator from Tennessee had an oil lease and brought in a discovery well, he would have been allowed under the old law to deplete on the basis of value instead of cost, as I think he should; but if I had a lease adjoining his, and I brought in a well subsequent to his well, I would not be allowed to deplete on the basis of discovery value, but on the basis of cost.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this subject of depletion has not only been before the Congress but it has been before the Department ever since the income tax on corporations was started. I want to say to the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle that one of the most injurious of all their policies was the policy which they enacted for the big oil operators in this country, for the benefit of men like Mr. Rockefeller, Harry F. Sinclair, H. L. Doherty, and Andrew W. Mellon. In my judgment, a policy was initiated and carried through by Mr. Mellon for his own interest and the interest of his oil associates. It is one of the most indefensible policies that any government every stood for; and I am here to ask the administration of which I am a member not to stand for a continued exemption from taxation of 50 percent of all the net income of the oil companies of the land. It is not fair or right; it is unjust to all the other taxpayers, and it ought not to be permitted by the Senate.

I saw in the paper a day or two ago that some of the lobbyists who are here now have said that they have this depletion allowance fixed just as they want it, and that it is going to continue just as it is. I hope the Finance Committee of the Senate will not permit these men who are lobbying for those who have had their capital exhausted time and again under present law to continue to have an exemption of 50 percent.

Mr. GORE. At this time, as the Senator knows, it is 27½ percent.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is 27½ percent of the gross profits. It is not less than 50 percent of the net profits.

Mr. GORE. No; not to exceed 50 percent of the net profits.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is not making a point on that sort of language, is he—"not to exceed"? They actually get, in practice, an exemption of 50 percent. For instance, some of us get salaries of $8,500. Suppose we have a net income of $7,000. We pay on that. Not so these oil companies that are favored by the Congress. Under similar circumstances they pay only on $3,500. It is not fair or just to the other taxpayers of the country.

But let me proceed.

In 1921, when our Republican friends came into power, they not only enlarged the depletion allowances for oil and gas, but they appointed a "tax simplification board." I will yield to anybody who will rise to his feet in the Senate and stand for the tax simplification board. No one seems to rise. Some of us probably are not very familiar with that board. It was not long before that board, by the action of Mr. Mellon, appointed William M. Davis, of Oklahoma, president of the Mid-Continental Gas and Oil Association, as a member of the board, and I believe he is still "simplifying." A man does a good deal of "simplifying" to get an exemption of 50 percent on the great oil industry of our land, or to secure its exemption from any taxation at all. The Republican Party reduced taxes all along the line on these great concerns that were able to pay taxes, but I believe they have given more bounties and gratuities to the oil companies than to any other class of favored Americans, except the sea-going vessels and the air mail proprietors. Of course, these last are first.

I am informed Mr. Davis is still active here. I am informed that he is in Washington, and is now engaged in the same business of "simplifying", and now is willing to let well enough alone and to accept the present law extending the 50-percent exemption forever; but I hope the Congress will not permit this subsidy by way of exemption any longer.

What did he do about depletion? I am informed that in 1926 he was the man who perpetuated the oil-depletion allowances. The capital account was all gone by that time. The years of the life of the oil field had passed, and the capital account had all been taken up in exemptions; and thereupon the law was changed so as to provide that thereafter the oil companies should be taxed on but one half of their net income.

In 1921 the Republican Party, then in control of the Government, arranged that the depletion allowance should be 100 percent of the net income. That meant that the oil people, at that time probably the richest class in the country, paid little or no income tax.

In 1924 the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]—and I am sorry he is not here this afternoon—was the chairman of a committee appointed to investigate this very depletion allowance. The depletion allowance had been denounced on this floor time and again. I think I denounced it a number of times. The committee was appointed, and Senator COUZENS was made chairman. That committee spent $200,000 to get the facts, and they got the facts. Is there any Senator here who has read them—any Senator who has looked into them? There was a report that cost $200,000 of the people's money—a valuable report. I wonder how much attention the Finance Committee has given to it. I see two members of that committee here right now. I will ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] if they have ever done anything at all with the Couzens report on depletion allowances. As I understand, it has just been pigeonholed and shelved. I hope this administration will not shelve that report but will use it to mete out justice to the taxpayers of this country and to require oil companies making dividends to pay their fair share of taxes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator mentioned my name as a member of the Finance Committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not know the context of the observation which the Senator made. I heard the words "Couzens report on the question of depletion."

May I say that one of the most troublesome questions that has been before the Finance Committee for years was the question of depletion, particularly with respect to oil fields and gas and mineral deposits. If the Senator will pardon me further——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Obviously, every pound of ore taken from a mine is an attack upon capital and diminishes the value of the property; and every gallon of oil that is taken from the ground is likewise a depletion or reduction of capital. How to allow a proper compensation, so to speak, for taxes imposed by reason of the depletion or reduction of capital, is a very difficult thing.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question right there? Suppose an oil company's fields were given a discovery value, say, in 1918 of $5,000,000, and were given a depletion allowance of $1,000,000 a year for 5 years. After that period was over, does the Senator believe that thereafter for all time, as long as the fields continue to produce, they ought to be allowed annually a 50-percent depletion when the full allowance had been made in the first 5 years?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I cannot answer that question categorically. I will say that I was not satisfied with the provisions found in a number of our laws with respect to oil depletion. As I state, it has been a very troublesome question. Experts were employed—men who were not engaged in the oil business or in the mining business—and they made very searching investigations with a view to submitting a formula which would be fair and just, allow proper depletion, and yet at the same time not exempt the mining companies or the oil companies from a proper tax.

With respect to the depletion allowance for coal and for minerals, I think a rather fair adjustment was made. I will say to the Senator that I never was satisfied with the provisions with respect to oil and gas; and yet I do not want that broad statement of mine to remain in the RECORD without some modification and some explanation, which I shall not take the trouble to make now in the time of the Senator. I will say to the Senator, however, that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] and I conducted a very searching examination a number of years ago which resulted, I think, in some improvement. It resulted in the establishment of a court in the Treasury Department for the purpose of passing upon many of the controverted and litigated questions. I think some reforms were effectuated as a result of that investigation.

That all of the evasions of taxation that have characterized many individuals and many corporations were prevented of course it is obvious was not the case. Notwithstanding the very earnest efforts made by the Department, as well as by Senators and Representatives in the various committees and upon the floor of the House and the Senate, to prevent these evasions and to avoid these loopholes by legitimate and proper legislation, we have been unsuccessful. Recent revelations show that some individuals have formed corporations in Canada and in Newfoundland, have transferred—theoretically, at least—their assets and their holdings to these foreign corporations, and by so doing they have evaded just taxes which ought to have been imposed upon them.

Congressman HILL and a subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House during the summer have been trying to find out these loopholes and to plug them up, to use the language of the street; and I am sure the Finance Committee will give serious attention to the measure when it comes up for their consideration with a view to supplementing, if possible, the corrective proposals that have been submitted by the Committee on Ways and Means.

I think there have been many evasions. Many corporations and many individuals and many partnerships have escaped paying taxes which were justly due to the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am glad to have this contribution from the Senator from Utah and his assurance that corrections of the present unjust and unfair system of depletion allowances will be made. He is uniformly fair in attempting to deal with the country's business. He is on the Finance Committee. I invite his attention especially to the three important matters that I have brought up; and I am sure the committee will give these questions the attention that in my judgment they deserve.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator from Georgia in just one moment.

I have no doubt in the world but that upon an examination of the Couzens report, which I recommend to every Senator here before he votes on the revenue bill, he will find that it is his duty not any longer to continue these great subsidies by tax exemption to these several classes of corporations.

I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee used my name with reference to the Couzens report. That is, he called attention to the fact that I was a member of the Finance Committee.

I should like to say to the Senator from Tennessee that my recollection now is that we utilized the Couzens report as the basis of certain of the provisions that we inserted in the last tax act, or in the tax act that was passed immediately after that report was made public. I am quite sure that the report has not been pigeonholed.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I say to the Senator right there that if they were used, they were used to perpetuate the 50-percent exemption to oil companies after the period had expired in which all their capital exemption had already been allowed.

Mr. GEORGE. I think if the Senator will examine what actually was done, he will find that that is not an altogether accurate statement. I know we did utilize much of the data that had been gathered together in that report; and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] was himself a member of the committee that made the report, and served along with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] in the submission of the report.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think the Senator from Utah signed the report, if I remember aright. I think the report was signed by only one member of the committee, but I am not sure about that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. KING. One of the difficulties with respect to depletion growing out of oil wells, as well as of mineral deposits, results from the fact that new discoveries are made. An oil well will be sunk, and there will be considerable flow. There may be, by additional work, a new discovery. A mine may be opened up. They will value it and determine that there are so many hundred thousand or million tons of oil. Later on, by sinking the shaft deeper or by following some little lead into contiguous territory, a new deposit of oil may be opened up; and the difficulty has been to adopt some formula that would be just to allow proper credits for discoveries and depletion by reason of the new discoveries.

I may say to the Senator from Tennessee that I think this is one of the most complicated questions that has ever been brought to the attention of the Committee on Finance; and as a member of that committee I can assure my able friend from Tennessee that if he can shed any light upon the question and can aid the committee in drafting measures that will be just and fair to all, particularly to the Government and to the taxpayers, we shall welcome any suggestions.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call the Senator's particular attention to the remarkable array of figures in the two tables I have already placed in the RECORD. I hope he will look at them tomorrow, and he will find there how unjust and unfair the present law is.

I shall conclude my remarks in a few more moments.

The committee was appointed and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] was made chairman, and there was spent $200,000 of the people's money in showing how infamous and how outrageous these depletion allowances to the oil people were. The result was, not the repeal of the law, but the passage of an amendment changing the law so as to allow about 27½ percent of gross income, or 50 percent of net income, as depletion, and this after all of the capital allowances had already been made.

Why the great oil corporations and the great oil operators should be given this species of gratuity by the Government seems never to have been explained. Under the rule of the Republican administration, sums amounting to billions of dollars were spent; but I never heard anything about economy then, when we were turning the tax exemption by way of subsidy over to this great class of our citizens.

In 1932, under the act which was passed in that year, these depletion allowances were made perpetual for mines as well as oil; and the result is that we have lost probably in the neighborhood of $5,000,000,000 from depletion allowances alone.

In other words, our friends on the other side of the aisle complain because our present big-hearted, great-minded American President has recommended and carried out a just act giving about $4,000,000,000 to help those whom they have ruined by their policies; and yet during the 12 years that the Republican Party was in power there were squandered at least $5,000,000,000 in depletion allowances alone, and more than three times that amount in commissions and allowances and credits given to favored corporations.

Mr. President, the plain facts are that for years our income-tax laws have been manipulated by the great interests involved through lobbyists at the Capitol, and perhaps, Mr. President, in part through some of the officials of the departments who ought not to have lent aid and comfort to the lobbyists. It is fair to say that many of them may not have intentionally done so, but nevertheless they did it.

I know very little about lobbyists, Mr. President. They made a mark on my door many years ago, and they come to see me but seldom. I do know, however, that they are here, and they are plying their trade in the interest of those who pay them to be here.

The great trouble with our income tax laws is, first, the mystery and secrecy about their enforcement, and, second, their intricacies and the abstruseness of methods of using words and phrases—the exceptions, the deductions, the references to other sections and to other pages and parts of the law. This makes them so complicated that the proverbial Philadelphia lawyer could not understand them. But all of these intricacies, all of these evasive words, all of these complicated sentences, all of these references to other pages and parts of the same law, all have a meaning all their own, and that meaning is to excuse some great concern from the payment of just taxes to the Government.

Mr. President, I have brought these matters to the attention of the Senate at this time because the two committees—one in the House and one in the Senate—are now considering amendments to the tax laws. I ask the House and I ask the Senate to give these three questions, namely, the question of depletion allowances, the unjustifiable deductions now in force, and, lastly, the question of that class of corporations which are escaping taxes entirely, while paying out to their stockholders enormous dividends, their careful and prayful attention so that our tax laws may be equally administered and so adjusted as to be absolutely fair and just to every taxpayer. Equal and exact justice to every taxpayer, no subsidies and no exemptions to any class, should be the aim of every tax bill.

COCONUT-OIL IMPORTATIONS

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a clipping from the Minneapolis Tribune in the form of a statement by Professor Gramlich, of the University of Nebraska, as to coconut-oil importations into the United States.

Professor Gramlich says:

> In other words, the coconut oil imported during the 5 months amounted to the fat produced by 4,500,000 steers or the fat from 15,000,000 head of 200-pound hogs, or 90 times as much butterfat in pounds as Nebraska cows produced in the same 5-month period.

This administration has asked for and was granted power to place tariffs and embargoes on imports in competition with farm products.

Why is this power still dormant in face of such compelling figures of imports and in face of such a tragic fall in prices of fats and oils raised on the American farm?

I ask permission to have the entire article printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the Minneapolis Tribune, Jan. 13, 1934]

COCONUT-OIL IMPORTS GAIN—LEADER IN EMBARGO MOVEMENT GIVES FIGURES SHOWING RAPID INCREASE

LINCOLN, NEBR., January 12.—Prof. H. J. Gramlich, of the University of Nebraska College of Agriculture, Thursday night released figures he compiled which show coconut-oil importations into the United States are increasing at a rapid rate.

Gramlich is a leader in a Nebraska farm movement to have Congress put an embargo on the importation of such products. He was informed by Congressman E. R. BURKE, of Omaha, that such legislation is progressing favorably.

During the 5 months ending December 1, 1933, Gramlich's statistics show, importations of coconut oil amount to approximately 450,000,000 pounds. During the same period of 1932 the importations totaled 224,000,000 pounds. If continued at this rate, Gramlich said, importations would reach 1,035,284,000 pounds for the present fiscal year.

"In other words", Gramlich's report said, "the coconut oil imported during the 5 months amounted to the fat produced by 4,500,000 steers or the fat from 15,000,000 head of 200-pound hogs, or 90 times as much butterfat in pounds as Nebraska cows produced in the same 5-month period."

THE GREAT INTERNATIONAL POKER GAME

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I wish to make a few observations concerning the great international poker game that started in this morning with the American dollar at 59, and tomorrow perhaps at 55, with Mr. Morgenthau sitting at the table with $2,000,000,000 as chips that were taken from the Federal Reserve bank, of which I fear there will be nothing left if the able Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is correct that the Secretary of the Treasury has no experience in that line, and, in the vernacular, would not know the difference between a full house and a royal flush.

Mr. President, one of the outstanding achievements of President Andrew Jackson, the hero of Democracy, was the abolition of the old United States Bank. It had been tried and found wanting. Its principal contribution to finance was the precipitation of panic. It did not aid, but undermined, public confidence.

The President, in his message to this Congress, announced the policy of abjuring the "old civilization." The outstanding object of this policy is to revive the United States Bank, which Jackson abolished, and raise it to the *n*th degree as the world's greatest central bank. Jackson did away with the old United States Bank for the very reasons that the present Democratic administration advances in favor of its present policy. It is now doing the very thing that President Jackson undid 100 years ago.

The Senate Banking and Currency Committee, on the advice of leading financiers, reported in favor of a board of five, including the Comptroller of the Currency and the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, as the board of bank directors charged with administration of the stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 instead of the one-man board suggested by the White House.

In the hearings before the Senate committee Owen D. Young and other authorities pointed out that a one-man board would give the Secretary of the Treasury the financial powers now vested in the Federal Reserve System. But what are the views of financiers worth, and what are the recommendations of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee worth, against a telephone call from the White House? It seems all that is necessary to pass any measure in the present Congress, with or without debate—mostly without—is for the majority floor manager to rise and say, "The President wants it this way."

That settles all debate and all roll calls. We are told to banish "old civilizations"; but the present Government seems to have just one article in its Constitution, and that article is about 5,000 years of age. It reads now as it read then:

The ox knoweth his master's crib.

Unless a bill is made to read as the White House dictates what becomes of the patronage pork, what becomes of the doles from the alphabetical bureaus, and what becomes of the sinews of war in the next congressional elections?

So the "old civilization" is with us still, and raised to the *n*th degree. The oxen and the cribs are here, Even the old United States bank of a century ago has come back.

There are something over 6,000 national banks in the United States, but only one of them has a one-man board, and that is the revived United States Bank.

All of our banks have bankers on their boards except one, and that is the United States Bank just created.

In listening to the hearings before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee we notice that the testimony is punctuated with the comments of a former Secretary of the Treasury, the honorable senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. As each clause of the bill creating the world's greatest central bank is read, and the power of Secretary Morgenthau thereunder is defined, we hear the Senator from Virginia announce, "And he is not a banker." Again and again he says, "He is not a banker."

So this United States Bank has a one-man board of directors, and he is not a banker, though he announces that he "is open for business" in operating a central bank greater than the Bank of England. The only precedent for such a condition is the N.R.A. administration, which places the control of all American industry and all domestic commerce in the hands of a brigadier general whose qualifications for business appear to consist in putting over the Military Draft Act of 1917.

What of the standing and what of the resources of the revived United States Bank, with its one-man board of directors?

The known banking resources of our 6,000 national banks, as exhibited by the Comptroller of the Currency, are upward of twenty billions.

What are the resources of this United States Bank with its one-man director? The President has told us in his Budget message. The resources comprise, first, a public debt of thirty-two billions, and, second, a prospective Budget deficit of seven billions.

That is to say, this United States Bank, with its one-man board, starts in with an insolvency of such huge proportions that the human mind can with difficulty visualize its height and depth. We seem to have embarked in an international poker game in which "the sky is the limit."

Among the functions of this central bank are:

First. To seize and withdraw from public use all gold in the United States, namely, to convert one third of the world's gold into "frozen assets."

Second. To issue a new class of gold certificates that, first, are not redeemable in gold; and, second, are not to go into circulation.

The time taken for disposition of this vast measure in the House seems to have been 15 minutes. There was no debate and no roll call. In the Senate there was a roll call, a brief debate on a few amendments killed, but as correctly stated by the press, no debate on the wisdom of the bill.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] stated on the floor that the committee were unable even to locate the author of the bill which the administration demanded to be passed without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

All that anyone seems to know about the wisdom of the bill is boiled down to this: There is a telephone call from the White House to put it through P.D.Q. Beyond that, all that it is necessary to know is the old Biblical theme of a civilization in the time of Moses—

The ox knoweth his master's crib.

Result—we revive in expanded form the United States Bank which Andrew Jackson abolished 100 years ago.

If on the testimony of Andrew Jackson the United States Bank of olden time undermined public confidence and was a detriment to public business, will another United States Bank with a one-man director—and he not a banker—bring back public confidence and inaugurate recovery? Only the brain trust knows.

In all the declarations that have come to us from the administration, we have received not a hint of the stewardship of the last 10 months, but all through them rings the words: "Power! More power! Give me more power!" No explanation is made of what is done. We have only glittering generalities, a cracker-barrel philosophy which the Postmaster General says, "is thoroughly adequate to meet the Nation's problems in these times of economic stress." "We'll try it; and if it doesn't work, we'll try something else by cracky! If the patient dies, he would have died anyway. If he lives, it is due to our doctoring." A small boy parading as a physician in his father's silk hat! Much dramatized acting with high-sounding phrases and great pretense of fierce attack!

I am inclined to say with Shakespeare, "Words, words, words"; and, as he says, "Words without thoughts never to heaven go."

A subservient Congress has given the administration the powers of a dictator to use the taxpayers' money to close all possible avenues of actual information to the people, but in the words of our immortal Lincoln, "You can fool some of the people all of the time, and all of the people some of the time, but you cannot fool all of the people all the time."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

I delight to do Thy will, O my God.

Such was the language and the spirit of Him who was earth's sublimest teacher. Father in Heaven, may we not be satisfied until we have attained something of the same conscious surrender to duty. We pray that difficulty of task may be forgotten in the joy that it gives. Inspire us with fortitude and determination that our hours may be steeped in the atmosphere of patriotic zeal and service. Let visions and expectations be the forces urging us on to splendid achievements. Thy kingdom, O Lord, may it come. It is the very core of all things glorious, the secret of our national progress, and the goal of the ages. Be Thou a restraining, a renewing, a harmonizing, and a softening influence among us. Give us a deep realization that whenever purity of thought and uprightness of conduct are maintained all things of beauty, love, and joy shall follow. So may it be, our Father, in Thy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H.J.Res. 250. Joint resolution to provide appropriations to carry into effect the act entitled "An act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia", approved January 24, 1934.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. STEPHENS and Mr. MCNARY members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments", for the disposition of useless papers in the Commerce Department.

CONTINUATION OF C.W.A. A NECESSITY

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the C.W.A. program.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the order recently issued by Federal Relief Administrator Hopkins to shorten hours, reduce pay, and gradually abandon the C.W.A. entirely after February 15, if carried into effect, would create a condition of indescribable distress.

It would be a crime against humanity to take any such action at this time. There is no justification to do so.

The C.W.A. form of work relief has done more to help the man at the bottom than any other form yet offered. It has substituted work for charity. It has kindled anew the spirit of pride that was rapidly vanishing under the necessity of accepting a dole or a food order. It has placed men in work lines instead of bread lines. Despair has been displaced and hope and cheer substituted.

It was expected that the C.W.A. program of work for the unemployed would continue until such time as public-works projects and revived industry would be able to provide employment. But the public-works program has failed to do so. Governmental red tape has delayed approval of plans for these projects to such an extent that this means of providing work for the unemployed has, up to this time, proved a failure. And, unfortunately, industry has not sufficiently revived as yet to give employment to the millions still without work. Thus the need for the continuation of the C.W.A. is just as great today as when it was first started. Instead of cutting down or discontinuing its activities, it should be widened and extended. It should include single men with dependents and many others who are now by its regulations prevented from obtaining such employment.

What reason is given for the order to shorten hours and cut wages? It has been said that the appropriation for relief previously made has been exhausted. Others have said there is a limit to the money that can be raised and expended. What a travesty on the financial standing and ability of this, the richest Nation in the world.

If our Nation could loan or give $10,000,000,000 of money to European countries, and spend twenty billions more to win a war for someone else, then we can and should spend at this time the necessary few hundred millions of dollars to provide work for the unemployed by means of the C.W.A., the C.C.C., and other agencies, and be ready and willing to do so in such amounts as may be necessary as long as the need shall exist.

When the Civil Works Administration program was inaugurated on November 9 last it was said by the President:

> I am very confident that the mere fact of giving real wages to 4,000,000 Americans who today are not getting wages is going to do more to relieve suffering and to lift the morale of the Nation than anything undertaken before.

Subsequent results have justified that opinion. But the need is just as great today as it was on November 9, and from present indications will continue to be for sometime to come. Suffering must be relieved after as well as before February 15. It must be relieved whenever and wherever it exists. There must be no let up in providing relief as long as the need continues, and I shall so vote.

The orders should be changed from "stop" to "go ahead."

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1935

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 7513) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the Judiciary and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes; and pending that I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if we cannot agree that general debate shall not extend beyond 3 o'clock and 15 minutes, and any debate after that be confined to the bill, the time to be equally divided between us.

Mr. BACON. That is entirely satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question. Is it intended to finish the bill today?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I do not think it is possible.

The motion of Mr. OLIVER of Alabama was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LOZIER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. PATMAN. I was not in the Chamber yesterday——

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

I am wondering whether my colleague would like to have the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] present?

Mr. PATMAN. I certainly would. I was not present when he referred to me on yesterday.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield? Was the gentleman from Texas present when the gentleman from Illinois made his speech yesterday?

Mr. PATMAN. I was only present during the last part of it. I was not here when he referred to me. On the question of paying the adjusted-service certificates I am as much interested in it today as I ever was—as much interested in trying to get a law passed that will provide for the full and immediate cash payment of the remainder due on those certificates.

NOT A BONUS

I do not like to hear any Member, not even the gentleman from Illinois, call it a bonus certificate. It is not a bonus; it does not represent a bonus; it is a debt. The smartest thing our former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, ever did was to name it a bonus, so that every time a veteran used the word "bonus" he would condemn his own cause that he was speaking for.

So I do not think any Member ought to refer to it as a bonus. I want to see the certificates paid. I think it will do the country more good than any plan that has been suggested to put money into circulation. It will go into every nook and corner of the country and it can be paid without a bond issue, without an increase in taxes, without increasing our national debt, and actually save the taxpayers $112,000,000 annually for 12 years.

There are many reasons why it should be paid but I will not enter into a discussion of them because I have, on many occasions, given them. I am as heartily in favor of the bill today as I ever was. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for February 18, 1932, commencing at page 4291, is disclosed how much money each county in the United States will get if certificates are paid now.

HISTORY OF LEGISLATION TO PAY CERTIFICATES

I have been criticized because I did not sign a petition to force the House to lay everything else aside and give consideration to House bill No. 1, which provides for such payment.

Let me review the history of this legislation. In 1930 the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] and I took it on ourselves to try and get a bill through the committee. We were not successful, but we were later successful in getting a bill reported to pay 50 percent of the face value of those certificates to the holders of those certificates. They were paid in credit—not new money—and therefore, did not do the maximum amount of good as a relief measure. No one, except ourselves, knows the punishment we had to take from House Members, and especially the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee. for persistently demanding consideration of this legislation. I know we made ourselves obnoxious when we many times visited each committee member, personally insisting upon their help. The members also accused us of arousing the veterans in their districts against them. The bill became law. If the full amount had been paid at that time, in new money, the deflation would have been arrested and our country started back on the way to recovery.

Later on, in 1932, another bill was insisted upon which provided for the full and immediate cash payment very similar to the one pending today. We presented a motion that was signed by 145 Members, which forced consideration of the bill, and on June 15, 1932, that bill was passed by the House of Representatives and went to another body.

DO NOT OVERLOOK THE SENATE

Remember, that Congress is composed of two Houses, the House of Representatives and the Senate. The Members of the House cannot make laws and send them to the White House for approval. The House not only must pass the bill but the other body must also pass the bill. When that bill went to the other body it was very quickly and promptly killed by an overwhelming vote. The other body gave us to understand that they were opposed to that legislation. Very well. Since that time, and only last Saturday, January 27, 1934, the same proposal to pay the adjusted-service certificates was presented in that other body in a very favorable light as an amendment to the gold bill. In other words, a Member of that body presented an amendment to the gold bill which provided that the adjusted-service certificates should be paid out of the increased profits on the gold. You cannot conceive of a more favorable light in which to present the proposition to that body, and that body quickly and promptly killed it again. I wonder why a record vote was not asked. I wonder if it was to protect certain Members of that body who are now candidates for reelection and are posing as great friends of the veterans.

WE WANT RESULTS, NOT IDLE GESTURES

We want to do what is in the interest of the passage of this legislation and its enactment into law. Would we be doing the veterans a service or a disservice if we forced consideration of the bill in the House at this time when there is no more favorable outlook for it in the other body than there is today? It is the other body blocking the legislation, not this one.

Just one Member of that body under its rules can present the question today or tomorrow, or any other day, as an amendment to another bill and get it voted on. If that body should pass that bill or a similar bill, or do anything to indicate a more favorable attitude toward the legislation, I would be the first to sign the petition here to force consideration of the bill in the House. Why should we make a futile attempt? Should we create false hopes in the minds of the veterans that they are going to get this money and let them anticipate a way to spend it? Would we be doing them a service with the present unfavorable outlook if it could possibly excite them to the extent of spending money for telegrams and getting up petitions and coming to Washington and doing many other things by reason of the hope thus created? Would we be doing them a service if we had no more hope of enacting the bill into law than we have at the present time with the determined and stubborn opposition of the other half of this Congress?

WHEN OPPORTUNE TIME ARRIVES

We would probably be doing them a disservice, and let it be understood, my friends, the very moment that the time is opportune, that I believe that bill can be enacted into law, that moment I shall do what is necessary to get or force consideration or anything else that will cause it to be considered and passed in this body.

DISABLED TO BE CONSIDERED

The Disabled American Veterans, a national organization of World War veterans, feel that it would interfere with their program if brought up in the House now. They are all service-connected veterans and should be given consideration. They passed a resolution that the disabled should come first in this Congress and that the payment of the adjusted certificate should come second. They say they do not want to interfere with restoring the benefits to their disabled comrades and to their dependents. The American Legion has taken a similar attitude. They are the two exclusively World War veterans' organizations that have been recognized by Congress. Should we in the face of that determination lightly throw it aside and say that we are going to do it anyway, although legislation is pending with some hope of success of getting it passed to relieve many inequalities and injustices of the Economy Act and for the general relief of disabled veterans and their dependents? I say that it will not be right for the Government to charge the veterans one penny of interest on their certificate loans since October 1, 1931, and I expect to oppose with every ouce of energy that I possess the collection or charging of such interest. Do you think, under the circumstances, that it would be the right thing for the House to do at this time? Who are the veterans that want this bill passed? Many of them do; they have a right to request it. I want the bill passed myself. But very few veterans would have us make a futile attempt to pass it. They want results. They do not want idle gestures made. They want the bill actually passed.

NOT AS IT WAS IN 1932

A different situation prevails now from the situation that prevailed in 1932. In 1932 we had no program for national recovery. The man in the White House was offering nothing constructive. The only thing he offered was to build a few aluminum buildings throughout the country to restore prosperity. It was a field day for everybody; it was an open season for plans. Anybody had a right to present a plan here because no plan was offered by the administration that would bring this country back. They were sitting down there twiddling their thumbs doing nothing toward bringing us out of the depression. Our bill would have caused a long step to be made in that direction and, I believe, would have done the work.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

NO-PROGRAM HOOVER

Mr. SNELL. Did not President Hoover in the beginning of the last session of the Seventy-second Congress present some definite program to Congress, and did not the gentleman's own committee throw it out of the window without consideration, and some of the suggestions that he made were afterward taken up by your own Democratic President?

Mr. PATMAN. Oh, this depression started long before the Democrats got charge of this House. It started in September 1929. The Democrats did not control Congress until December 1931.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman said that there was no plan presented here.

REPUBLICAN CAUCUS THEN AND NOW

Mr. PATMAN. Let me say to the gentleman that he had plenty of time before the Democrats took charge. When I came here the Republicans had to have this whole House to meet in when they held a caucus; hardly any Democrats here.

Mr. SNELL. And that time will come again soon.

Mr. PATMAN. And now you can almost have your caucus in telephone booth no. 1. Mr. Hoover made no constructive attempt to bring this country back; he was no more than a hired hand of Mr. Mellon. He was the elected head of a party of thumb twiddlers, doing nothing to help suffering humanity, for fear the toes of Wall Street would be stepped on.

ATTEMPTED EXCUSE—NOT A REASON

Mr. SNELL. I think the gentleman is making a misstatement, and it is not fair to Mr. Hoover, regardless of what he may think of him. He made some concrete, definite suggestions to this House, and the Democratic majority would not help, would not cooperate with him. They never cooperated a particle during the whole Seventy-second Congress, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. PATMAN. Oh, the gentleman is just giving an excuse, not a reason. This panic started 6 months after Mr. Hoover was inaugurated, when he had a Republican House and Senate; 18 months of it continued during the Seventy-first Congress. He did not need Democratic help at that time.

Mr. SNELL. I am stating the facts.

SCROOGE, SECRETARY OF TREASURY

Mr. PATMAN. I think I should exonerate Mr. Hoover, and I submit the gentleman is possibly right, because he was not in a way responsible. You had Ebenezer Scrooge as Secretary of the Treasury, who had charge of this country. He was running it, and Mr. Hoover was no more than a puppet. He was doing just exactly what Mr. Mellon, the present-day Ebenezer Scrooge, said he should do, and the Republican side did just exactly what Mr. Mellon said do, through the man in the White House at that time.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I should be very glad to compare the intelligence of the Treasury Department during that time with the intelligence of the Treasury Department since March 1933.

Mr. PATMAN. Certainly, if we let the gentleman be the judge.

Mr. SNELL. I will let the country be the judge.

Mr. PATMAN. Because the gentleman from New York thinks Mr. Mellon was about the best man in the world. You worshipped him on that side. It is noticeable, however, that you never refer to him, as you used to, as the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton.

"MELONITIS" AND "INSULLITIS"

Yesterday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] attacked me about not signing the petition. Of course, he is the self-appointed Eddie Cantor of the Republican side. [Laughter.] In other words, the gentleman is very much disturbed because the Republicans are losing out. The gentleman is sorry because Mr. Insull had to go over to Greece. He is sorry that Mr. Mellon had to leave this country between sun down one evening and sun up the next morning. The gentleman is sorry about all that. In other words, practically all the Republicans that were on this side when I came here are now afflicted with two diseases which may be called "Mellonitis" and "Insullitis." [Laughter.] It causes them to have a disposition to want to yap and nag. The other day the Washington Post, in an article, as presented to the House a few days ago by our distinguished majority leader [Mr. BYRNS] said that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] had appointed himself to come on the floor to just nag and tease the Democrats and not to offer anything constructive, not to try to do anything that would help the country, but just to nag, obstruct, and throw monkey wrenches at their program. I do not think this is the time to do that.

I know the gentleman is a very fine man. I have nothing against him personally. He is now and always has been since I have known him a very playful sort of a gentleman. He was playful here in Congress when people were starving in Chicago. He was playful when starvation was stalking all over this land. He was playful then and he is playful now. He was having a good time then and he is having a good time now. I do not think he has changed, but the country has changed, which renders his playfulness less inappropriate.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

A REAL CONSTRUCTIVE PROGRAM

Mr. PATMAN. Just a moment now. Although we had a man then in the White House who was not trying to feed the starving in Chicago and not trying to give people jobs, he did permit eighty or ninety million dollars to be loaned to one man in Chicago, but he was not doing anything for the starving people of Chicago in the way of giving them a job or something to eat. Now we have a man in the White House who is really giving people jobs all over the country [applause], giving direct relief where necessary, restoring the buying power of the farmers and wage earners, refinancing and saving the homes and farms of the people, and restoring an honest dollar, and the gentleman from Illinois really has something to be glad about and to be playful about. I am glad to see him in that good humor, playful attitude all the time. I yield to the gentleman, although he did not show me the courtesy of letting me know he was going to attack me on yesterday in order that I might be present.

WHAT VETERANS DISPLEASED?

Mr. BRITTEN. I did not attack the gentleman yesterday. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman refers to my playfulness. It is true that I try to be playful; I try to be kindly with every Member on the floor of this House, but the gentleman himself was playful for 5 years prior to the advent of Mr. Roosevelt, when he was playing with the veterans of the country; he was continually tickling them under the chin all the time.

Mr. PATMAN. That is absolutely not true; not one word of it. I have sincerely and earnestly tried to see that they get justice in every way and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. BRITTEN. And he is doing nothing for them today.

Mr. PATMAN. That is absolutely untrue. I am doing everything I can, and I expect to continue. Now, which veterans are displeased with my acts? Let us analyze that. Now, let us see what veterans are displeased with me. Are the service connected displeased? Not one vote have I cast or act have I done that would displease them. Have the dependents of the service-connected veterans expressed any displeasure? Not one of them. Have the Spanish-American War veterans expressed any displeasure? As a member of the compromise committee last session, I stood out that they must go back on the rolls or there would be no compromise. So they are not displeased. Although they could not get as much as they would like to have gotten, they remained on the pension rolls.

ARE ILLINOIS VETERANS AGAINST ME 100 PERCENT?

The gentleman from Illinois stated that the World War veterans in Illinois are against me. I know that statement is not true. However, I will admit that quite a few veterans in the United States are very much opposed to my actions, and I think the House would be interested in knowing who they are.

First. All veterans who have service-connected cases and dependents of such veterans are very much pleased with my vote and acts. Not one has been contrary to their interests. According to regulations issued after the passage of the Economy Act, many of these veterans were reduced from 75 to 90 percent. In the compromise at the end of the last session of Congress I assisted in getting them a substantial increase with a limitation on reductions.

Second. The 36,325 widows and orphans of presumptively service-connected veterans that were stricken off the pension rolls as of July 1, 1933, by the regulations issued under the so-called "Economy Act" are pleased with my vote and acts, because I assisted in getting them every one reinstated without one penny's reduction at the end of last session of Congress in the compromise committee of which I was a member.

Third. The 105,000 Spanish-American War veterans that were stricken from the pension rolls by reason of regulations under the so-called "Economy Act" are not displeased with my vote and acts, because I assisted in getting them restored in the compromise at the end of last session. Although the amounts to be received by them are small, yet they are pleased that they were put back on the pension rolls.

Fourth. The permanently and totally disabled Spanish-American and World War veterans are not displeased with my vote and acts. By reason of the regulations under the Economy Act they were reduced to $20 a month. In the compromise at the end of last session of Congress I assisted in getting them partly restored and they will receive $30 a month.

Fifth. The regulations under the Economy Act caused 154,000 presumptive cases to be striken from the pension rolls as presumptives. The compromise committee caused these veterans to get a day in court by setting up special boards to pass on their cases, with the burden of proof on the Government to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that their cases were not service connected. Instead of being eliminated entirely from the pension rolls July 1, 1933, all of them remained on until their cases were decided or until October 31, 1933. I am sure that the ones in this class are not displeased with the assistance rendered by me in their behalf.

DISPLEASED VETERANS

I will admit that there are classes of veterans that are very much opposed to what I have done. First, there were some William Wolfe Smiths drawing $200, $300, and $400 a month under the guise of being retired emergency officers. They were also holding positions paying them thousands of dollars a year with the Veterans' Bureau. The regulations under the Economy Act caused 4,500 retired emergency officers to be stricken from the pension rolls. I did not do anything before the compromise committee to try to get them restored. In fact, I am against their restoration. In this group will be found many leaders of veterans' organizations. They have managed to work their way to the front in veterans' organizations that they belong to. They are now very much displeased with what I have done and the way I feel about their legislation and will, of course, make every effort to convince the veterans that I have betrayed them.

Second. Many veterans enlisted for service after November 11, 1918. The war was officially over July 2, 1921. For disabilities, these veterans received compensation at battle-casualty rates. The regulations under the Economy Act changed that and permits them to draw the same rates as a peace-time soldier. I approve of what was done in that regard and have done nothing to assist this class get their battle-casualty benefits restored, because they did not enter the service until the war was over.

Third. Prior to the passage of the Economy Act, March 20, 1933, veterans who were suffering from willful misconduct diseases were drawing battle-casualty compensation. Although I sympathize with a large number of these veterans, and would be in favor of giving many of them increased benefits, yet the principle of giving them battle-casualty pay was wrong. They do not agree with me, and, of course, are criticizing me very much, which they have a right to do. They are entitled to receive hospitalization at Government expense.

Fourth. There were many rich veterans who, prior to the passage of the Economy Act, were drawing large amounts from the Government each month for nonservice-connected disabilities and also receiving hospitalization for nonservice-connected disabilities at Government expense. The regulations under the Economy Act changed this, and I did nothing before the compromise committee to assist them in getting any such benefits restored. Many in this group are also opposed to what I have done and what I am doing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Texas 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

CORRECTION

Mr. BRITTEN. I want to be entirely frank and fair with the gentleman. When on yesterday I made the remark which was provoked by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] when he said that 100 percent of the veterans in the gentleman's district were for the gentleman [Mr. PATMAN]——

Mr. BLANTON. And they are.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. PATMAN. I have not had one complaint about my vote on the so-called "gag rule", but the gentlemen seem to indicate that they complained pretty generally throughout my district about my vote on it. I have not had one complaint.

Mr. BRITTEN. I wish to correct what I said yesterday—that 100 percent of the veterans in my district were opposed to the gentleman. That was an error and I am sorry I said it. I should have said that 100 percent of the Federal employees of my district were against the gentleman and those other Members who voted for that unpopular gag rule.

Mr. PATMAN. I appreciate the gentleman making this correction. I have always thought he was fair. I believe he will correct more of his erroneous statements after deliberation. I am sorry to lose the good will of the Federal employees in the gentleman's district or any other place. I have always voted for good wages. They possibly do not know my record.

Mr. KELLER. Come to Illinois and we will elect you.

Mr. PATMAN. But whether it is veterans or Federal employees, so long as I am honest and conscientious in my beliefs no one should impugn my motives on any vote or act.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is right, and I hope he will realize that in my remarks yesterday I said nothing about the gentleman's insincerity. What I do complain about, however, is the gentleman's inactivity on veterans' legislation this year as compared with his activity under the Hoover administration.

HOOVER EMBARRASSED

Mr. PATMAN. Yes. The gentleman said I embarrassed the Hoover administration, the Mellon administration.

Mr. BRITTEN. I did not say anything about Mellon.

Mr. PATMAN. But I protest I was not the one responsible for Hoover's humiliation and embarrassment. The people of this Nation embarrassed him in 1932 by overwhelming defeat. There is where he got the greatest humiliation and embarrassment, and I do not think the gentleman should give me credit for all of it. He said I caused the embarrassment of the Hoover administration. He is giving me a lot of credit; I am not entitled to it and I do not accept it.

SELF-APPOINTED LEADER OF VETERANS

Furthermore, he says that I am the self-appointed leader of the veterans.

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, no, no.

Mr. PATMAN. That is what I understood the gentleman said. I do not know if anyone else entertains that opinion. The only thing I have done is to fight for legislation that I believed was right. I could name many Members of this House who have contributed several times more to the welfare of the veterans than I have. Their names and records are well known. In my feeble efforts to help them I have been handicapped by lack of experience, lack of knowledge, and not having the distinguished military record held by any of them. Being a member of the Veterans' Committee, just like the gentleman from Illinois is a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, the welfare of the veterans takes a great deal of my time. I am no more the self-appointed leader of the veterans on this side than the gentleman from Illinois is the self-appointed leader on all naval affairs.

Mr. BRITTEN. I have never said the gentleman was self-appointed. He had been a natural leader for the veterans while Hoover was President.

HOT GREASE TO COLD GREECE

Mr. PATMAN. And I am going to ask the gentleman a question. One of his distinguished fellow townsmen after robbing everybody in that city practically, possibly the gentleman himself, runs off from hot grease over here to cold Greece over there and now they are putting him out of cold Greece. Is the gentleman from Illinois willing to help bring Samuel Insull back to the United States?

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman expects the question to be answered. Of course, I have nothing whatever to do with Samuel Insull.

Mr. PATMAN. Is the gentleman in favor of bringing him back?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I am willing to bring him back.

Mr. PATMAN. Is the gentleman willing to support a bill or resolution seeking to influence his return?

Mr. BRITTEN. Samuell Insull contributed $10,000 to my Democratic opponent some years ago. That is a matter of record. That is how far his friendship went for me, as has been shown.

Mr. PATMAN. It is also a matter of record that he contributed to both sides because he wanted to stand in with the winner.

Mr. BRITTEN. He never contributed to my side.

Mr. PATMAN. Well, I do not know anything about that; but I know that in the Frank L. Smith senatorial campaign it is a matter of record that it was his policy to contribute to both sides.

ANOTHER MISTAKE

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] on yesterday made the following statement in his speech:

> There was not a day during the past 5 years hardly when the distinguished leader of that side of the aisle on veterans' legislation, Mr. PATMAN, was not around here circulating petitions for bonuses.

As I have often done before, I disclaim leadership of the veterans in this body or any other place. In truth and in fact, I never circulated a petition in the House for bonuses, payment of adjusted-service certificates, or anything else. Not only do I deny his statement that I was around the House practically every day circulating such a petition, but I say that I never did circulate a petition in the House, as charged by him. I did cause to be placed on the Clerk's desk one time a motion to discharge a committee, which is sometimes referred to as a petition, but I did not circulate it, and I hope the gentleman will correct his extravagant and erroneous statement. I am sure he made it in the heat of debate and should not be held accountable for it any more than for many other statements he made during the same speech.

NATIONAL TRIBUNE MISREPRESENTATION

Although I did not have one complaint from a constituent protesting against my vote on the so-called "gag rule" immediately preceding consideration of the independent offices appropriation bill a few days ago, I took exceptions to what the National Tribune printed, which left the impression that the adoption of the so-called "gag rule" prevented consideration of amendments in regard to veterans of the World War, Spanish-American War, and their dependents. On yesterday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] made the following statement in regard to the rule:

> It affected war veterans and it prevented you gentlemen, as well as Members on this side of the aisle, from offering amendments that would have straightened out many of the quirks and injustices that occurred after the enactment of the economy bill.

He also said:

> Any compensation taken from veterans or Federal employees could not be returned once that "gag rule" was adopted.

FACTS, PROOF, OR POLITICS

I say that the gentleman from Illinois is absolutely wrong. I ask him now to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of the rule and his explanatory reference, which discloses that the adoption of the rule prevented the House from considering any amendment in regard to Spanish-American War veterans or World War veterans or the dependents of either. I know now that he will not comply with this request, because he cannot produce the proof that his statements are correct. Of course, if he made the statements just for political effect, he will not endeavor to comply with my request but will let the matter drop.

I repeat that the adoption of that so-called "gag rule" did not prevent any Member of the House of Representatives from offering any amendment to the independent offices appropriation bill that would have been in order had the rule not been adopted.

WILL WORK FOR FULL PAYMENT

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me say that I expect to continue to work for the successful passage of the payment of the adjusted-service certificates. I believe it is the finest plan on earth to get money all over this Nation. I am not going to create any false hopes in the minds of three and a half million veterans. When I see the time is opportune to do it—I do not know whether it will be tomorrow or next week or next month—but if there is a development that makes that bill timely in the House with a possibility of success, you may rest assured, my dear sir, you will see my name on a petition and you will see me taking any other action that will cause the enactment of it into law. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I am always very much interested in listening to the veterans and the alleged friends of the veterans on the Democratic side who fought so valiantly in behalf of the bonus legislation years ago under Republican administrations. Now that you have finally achieved a Democratic administration we find those Members very lax in coming forward to fight the political battles, when necessary, in behalf of the World War veterans; and I would call attention to this fact that the bonus bill was passed twice over the veto of Republican Presidents, largely by Republican votes. But today when any veterans' legislation is brought up which President Roosevelt is against we find few or any friends of the veterans on the Democratic side standing up and fighting their battles as they fought them a number of years ago when they voted to override the veto messages of Republican Presidents or supported veterans relief legislation, much of which has been undone by a Democratic administration.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. PALMISANO. The Republican Party, of course, claims credit for passing the bonus bill. Is this correct? I wish to follow it up with another question.

Mr. FISH. The Bonus Act was passed under a Republican administration.

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes; and if the Members were sincere at that time why did they not issue bonds to cover the 20-year certificates so the question would not be left on the doorstep of the Capitol for the past 10 years.

Mr. FISH. A Republican administration also provided for 50-percent loans on the adjusted-service certificates, you will remember, when the emergency arose, and the World War veterans have generally collected this 50-percent loan. I should like to see the Democratic majority reduce the rate of interest on these loans immediately, so that the balance of the adjusted-service certificates will not be consumed and exhausted before the 20-year period expires. This could be passed immediately, if the Democrats really wanted to help the veterans through deeds and not lip service.

Mr. PALMISANO. In that connection let me say to the gentleman from New York that when they passed the 50-percent payment they also charged an interest rate which will eat up the balance of the 50 percent.

Mr. FISH. That is precisely what I am talking about. The rate of interest was reduced, as the gentleman should know, to 3½ percent by a Republican administration, and it ought to be reduced more; but you gentlemen who are now in the majority, an overwhelming majority in this House, have not done a thing in this Congress to help any World War or Spanish War veteran. Up to this very moment there has not even been a meeting of the World War Veterans' Legislation Committee. Unless legislation is introduced, hearings held, naturally there cannot even be any consideration of veterans' relief measures. The gentleman cannot expect us over here on the minority side to legislate for him.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman vote to eliminate all interest?

Mr. FISH. I will vote to reduce the interest rate, and maybe to eliminate it, if such a bill is brought in.

Mr. PATMAN. Will you vote to pay the adjusted-service compensation?

Mr. FISH. No; I am against that. I opposed it at the last session, and will continue to oppose it until our Budget is balanced and our unemployed provided for.

Mr. PATMAN. Is it not a fact that the minority during the Republican administration forced the majority to pass practically all the veteran legislation?

Mr. FISH. Oh, not at all. I am very thankful for the help of the gentleman and other veterans on your side in passing some veteran-relief legislation; but what I am saying now is a fact, that you are in power today and you have the authority to act, yet have done nothing except to stand up here and apologize for not acting.

Mr. PATMAN. Is it not a fact that when the Rankin bill was presented that would have put all border-line cases on the roll this forced the President to submit another law which granted the disability allowance to the veterans in the World War?

Mr. FISH. I thought the gentleman just disclaimed being able to force President Hoover to act. I cannot keep up with the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BROWNING. May I ask the gentleman if his statement is broad enough to include all of the ex-service men on this side?

Mr. FISH. I know there are some very sincere service men who would go to bat on the gentleman's side as well as on our side when the opportunity presents itself for constructive action.

Mr. BROWNING. The gentleman knows the situation which some of us were placed in at that time.

Mr. FISH. I do not know of a more courageous Member of the House than the gentleman from Tennessee, or a Member who is more sincere in his actions.

Mr. BROWNING. The gentleman disarms me. Yet the fact remains that a majority in the House could have kept part of the catastrophe from happening if they had defeated the Economy Act, whereas now it would take two thirds to override a veto.

Mr. FISH. And the gentleman knows what happened under the vicious rule the Democratic Rules Committee brought in the other day so far as the economy bill is concerned.

Mr. BROWNING. This did not apply to service men's legislation.

Mr. FISH. It dealt with the whole economy bill.

The gentlewoman from Arizona made a very beautiful and forceful speech here yesterday afternoon on behalf of the presumptive cases of those disabled veterans who have been deprived of hospitalization, although suffering from tuberculosis. I do not know that I can speak for every Republican on this side of the House, but I believe I can speak for nearly all of them when I say that if you will follow her advice and the guaranty she stated was given to her before she voted for that iniquitous gag rule, and bring in legislation restoring compensation to all veterans with service-connected disabilities that were done away with by the economy bill and the President's Executive orders, and provide for the restoration of hospitalization to all veterans who are insane or tubercular, that you will probably receive a unanimous vote on the Republican side of the House. As a veteran I challenge you to take up this legislation. As far as we could find out yesterday, you have not even had a hearing on veterans' relief legislation. If you are sincere, and if those guaranties given the lady from Arizona mean anything, you should not delay any longer the consideration of legislation to wipe out the injustices of the President's Executive order to actually disabled veterans and Spanish War veterans. I assure you that every Republican on this side will vote to restore the disability compensation to those veterans with war service-connected disabilities, and I believe they will vote to restore compensation to the Spanish War veterans as well.

This is the program of our side of the House, as far as veterans' relief legislation is concerned. There are three proposals: Restoration of the disability compensation to all veterans with service-connected disability that was being paid prior to March 20, 1933; restoration of benefits to Spanish War veterans; and hospitalization of all war veterans suffering from tuberculosis or insanity. If I have overstated the facts, I want any Republican on this side who disagrees with me to set me right.

Mrs. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentlewoman from California.

Mrs. KAHN. I trust that this includes the benefits to all widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish-American War?

Mr. FISH. Yes; but it does not include that part of the Legion bill that provides for pensions to widows and orphans of nonservice veterans.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. Is the gentleman in favor of the Legion's four-point program?

Mr. FISH. All except that part which provides for pensions to be paid to widows and orphans of the non-service-connected cases.

Mr. McFARLANE. Is the gentleman not in favor of the World War Veterans' Committee having a meeting in order to give us an opportunity to report out this legislation?

Mr. FISH. That is exactly what I have been talking about. Where are the Democratic veterans who previously advocated this legislation? What are they doing? Nothing that I know of except voting for "gag" rules.

Mr. McFARLANE. I will tell you.

Mr. FISH. The committee is not having any hearings.

Mr. McFARLANE. They have reported to me that they are not going to hold hearings until after they see what the Senate is going to do.

Mr. FISH. Why should they do that? Is there any reason? Since when have we waited upon the Senate to act on veteran legislation?

Mr. SWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SWICK. Who is Chairman of the World War Veterans' Committee?

Mr. FISH. I know who he is but not what he is doing.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. I may say to the gentleman from New York that we were prepared to hold hearings beginning last Tuesday on this four-point program. A bill has been introduced by me in the House. It was taken up before the Senate committee. Hearings were held. I understand that they are going on further with it.

I conferred with Members of the House in whom I had confidence and on whose judgment I could rely——

Mr. FISH. I cannot yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman attacked me on the floor here and the gentleman should yield. I can get the gentleman more time.

Mr. FISH. All right; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. We decided, under the circumstances, it would be best to hold up on these hearings until the matter was disposed of in the Senate.

Mr. FISH. Can the gentleman give the House any assurance as to when his committee will meet to take up this proposed legislation?

Mr. RANKIN. Is the gentleman going to give me enough time to answer that question?

Mr. FISH. I just asked the gentleman a short question.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand the subcommittee in the Senate voted down this measure. It will now come to the full committee and when the entire committee has acted it will be taken up in the Senate, either this week or next. If the proposed measure becomes a law, it will not be necessary to hold hearings on it. If it is not adopted, we expect to hold hearings as soon as the matter is disposed of over there, and I shall give the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] ample opportunity to come and tell the committee why they voted to take these benefits away from the veterans.

Mr. FISH. I do not know what the gentleman refers to. How long will the gentleman withhold his hearings, if the Senate does not act in the next week or so?

Mr. RANKIN. The Senate will act in the matter because it is on the independent offices appropriation bill.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman wait a week or 2 weeks or a month?

Mr. RANKIN. No; I do not expect to wait an unnecessary length of time. I hope to give the gentleman an opportunity to dig himself a storm cellar in the records of the Veterans' Committee because he needs it very badly.

Mr. BRITTEN and Mr. DITTER rose.

Mr. FISH. But not half so badly as the gentleman himself. I yield, first, to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call to the attention of the House at this moment, because of what the gentleman from New York has just said about the Democratic side refusing to do anything at the present moment for the veterans, to an issue of the Veterans' Patrol, a newspaper printed in California, under date of February 1934, in which it is stated:

> History is again repeating itself. The Democrats have never favored the veteran and never will. While the present administration was elected by the veteran vote, because of the antagonistic attitude of the Hoover administration, it now is necessary for the veteran to repudiate the Democratic administration and start work towards electing men to Congress who are friendly to the veteran cause. Get busy—don't accept the false promises of the present incumbents—form your opinion from past records and don't support a single politician who says he will favor the veteran if his past record shows otherwise. Elect a new Congress and forget the present occupants; they have failed to make good. What friends we have in Congress are not strong enough to give us help. Let us substitute some real friends to Congress in November.
> Tie a can to the tail of the Democratic Party, especially those politicians who show by their votes that they are being subsidized by Wall Street.
> It means that the veteran must get busy and defeat every Congressman who voted for the gag rule. It means that the veteran can expect nothing under a Democratic administration.

This does not say anything about Mr. Insull. [Laughter.]

Mr. FISH. The gentleman from Texas, in speaking to the House a while ago——

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I am sorry, but I cannot yield further, because I want to talk on another matter.

The gentleman from Texas referred to his pet hobby, criticizing the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, and the gentleman stated Mr. Mellon was the Government, and that President Hoover was not responsible because Mr. Mellon acted for him.

I am led therefore to ask certain questions about the present administration. Only a little while ago we passed the gold devaluation bill, almost without any committee hearings and with very little debate upon the floor of the House of Representatives. Then it was rushed through the other body and came back here without further consideration, was passed, and signed by the President.

I think the public would be interested to know who is the author of that bill and who sponsored it. Some newspapers stated that Professor Warren was the originator of the idea and immediately he denied it and said he had not seen it until 24 hours before it appeared in the newspapers. Up to this very moment no one seems to know where this devaluation bill came from; this bill which has reduced the pay of the wage earners of America 40 percent; this bill that has reduced the war debt 40 percent; this bill that has confiscated the wealth of the masses of America by 40 percent. It is a capital levy amounting to 40 percent, and yet we do not know who is the sponsor of the bill. Nobody will claim paternity or maternity of the measure. Whence did it emanate, out of whose fertile brain did this attack on American wage earners, consumers, and men and women of moderate and small incomes originate. What member of the "brain trust" is its father, and who is its unnamed mother.

Inasmuch as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] has stated that the Secretary of the Treasury in the last administration was the government, I think we would like to know just who is the government now and what part of the "brain trust" is responsible for this legislation that was rushed through Congress without consideration.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. Is it not a fact that the gold and currency bill of the President, instead of reducing the earnings of wage earners 40 percent reduced the swollen fortunes of New York 40 percent?

Mr. FISH. I am very pleased the gentleman has asked that question.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. FISH. I honestly believe that back home, because of misunderstanding and lack of debate on this measure, the people really believe what the gentleman has stated.

Mr. TRUAX. Is it not a fact?

Mr. FISH. Certainly not. They believe that the devaluation bill reduced the wealth of the rich by 40 percent, and if that were so, as a capital levy on wealth, it might be a very popular bill and would continue to be a popular bill, but as a matter of fact, while it is a capital levy, it is likewise confiscation of the wealth of the masses.

Mr. TRUAX. It is the best measure ever passed in this House.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is entitled to his opinion. I consider it ruinous to our wage earners and consumers and their standard of living. It is true it may hit one rich man, but wherever it does it hits 99 of the middle class and those with small incomes. It hits the wage earners, the consumers, the insurance policyholders, and the men and women who have a little money in the savings banks or own a few Government bonds or other securities. The compensation of the veterans, civil-service employees, and widows and orphans are likewise cut 40 percent. Yes; the gentleman is right—one rich man in Wall Street may be hit but 10,000 other poor people are equally hit 40 percent by this legalized confiscation. [Applause.]

It is time the public knew what this measure does. The debasing of the dollar will cheat and rob labor of its just hire. The public does not know about it today, but they will know it when the cost of living goes up and they attempt to buy with a 60-cent dollar when there has been a 50-percent increase in the cost of living. Then, when the American laborer, white-collar class, and consumer find out the reduced purchasing power of the 60-cent dollar, there will be an outcry that will be heard from one end of the country to the other, and many deserving Democrats will be looking for storm cellars and wondering what hit them. Then, perhaps, they will begin to ask each other what member of the "brain trust" wished the devaluation bill on them and from what unholy union was it born.

Mr. FORD. When the gentleman pays his income tax after the 15th of March——

Mr. FISH. You flatter me. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORD. Will the Government say to you, "We can take this check for only 59 cents on the dollar" or will they take it for its full value?

Mr. FISH. I lost all interest in the income taxes some time ago. [Laughter.] I am telling you that it is just as hard to earn the 60-cent dollar as it is the 100-cent dollar, and you will have to pay the increased cost of living besides. [Applause.] The gentleman does not know it now, but he will know more about it next November.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. If what the gentleman says is true, it would seem rather strange that there was no complaint from the wage earners over all the country, but the complaints come from Wall Street men.

Mr. FISH. That is true; the wage earners did not know it. Mr. Green knows it, and the American Federation of Labor knows it. They have stood against inflation all along; so has the American Legion; and by November all the American wage earners and consumers will know about it, and so will some Democrats who have been taking orders from the "brain trust."

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. If the gentleman will give me time, I will explain in reference to the veterans.

Mr. FISH. His compensation has been scrapped 40 percent.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Permit me to explain by one single instance. A man served over 20 years in the Navy. He is now past 70. He wants to go back home to die among his friends. The Economy Act reduced his pay of $50 a month to $15, and the gold devaluation bill has reduced it to eight or nine dollars.

Mr. FISH. Did the gentleman vote for the bill?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I voted for the gold bill, but I voted against the economy bill.

Mr. FISH. I cannot yield further. Now, nobody seems to know who sponsored the gold devaluation bill. If anybody on that side knows who was the author of the bill, I will yield to him. If anybody knows who originated the legislation, I think the public is entitled to that much information. Why the secrecy? Is the paternity of this bill already denied? Is the gold devaluation bill to go down in history shrouded in mystery, without mother or father having ever made any claim to their offspring?

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I know that no Republican wrote the bill.

Mr. FISH. I am quite sure of that, but that does not help me. I am trying to find out who was the author of the bill and who and what was behind it. The only people in the United States it really helps are the speculators and Wall Street stock-exchange gamblers and manipulators.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BROWNING. We are under the impression that the President of the United States had something to do with it.

Mr. FISH. That is what I wanted to know. This is then a bill that the President of the United States is not only responsible for but evidently had a great deal to do in drawing it up. That is what the gentleman wants me to believe.

Now, I hold in my hand an Associated Press report dated Washington, January 30, 1934. Although it is a newspaper report from the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, a conservative paper, after all, those of us who have been in politics for many years have become accustomed to rely on the Associated Press for accurate reports. Here is what it says in regard to the recent signing of the gold devaluation bill:

After signing the bill the President turned to Secretary Morgenthau, who will be in charge of the administering of the new monetary policy, and asked, "Now, that I have signed the bill, is it all right, Henry?" "No", quickly replied the Secretary of the Treasury, who must carry the load. "Have you read it?" asked Mr. Roosevelt with a laugh. "No", replied Morgenthau. "Neither have I", said Mr. Roosevelt, "but the experts say it is all right."

That is all I care to say on the paternity of the bill. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal these last few days about you Democrats and then again about you Republicans. I want to state that, so far as the Cherokee strip is concerned, we do not care very much about the ancient history of either side. One side gassed the veterans and the other has taken the hospitalization away from them; so I say to you Members of this Congress who are sincere and do not care to exploit the soldiers further: Come up here and sign the petition for the Patman bonus bill. There is not a veteran in the United States who does not want that bill passed. Sign this petition and then you will be doing something for the veterans. I do not care whether you are on the Republican or the Democratic side, just so you sign the petition.

I say further to you that in place of exploiting the farmers and passing make-believe farm legislation, the farmers of the United States want the Frazier-Lemke bill passed; and the petition for the Frazier-Lemke bill is up here at the Speaker's desk. Sign the petition for the Frazier-Lemke bill and the petition for the Patman bonus bill discharging the committees having those bills in charge, and you will have satisfied the farmers and the veterans of the Nation; and then you need not exploit them by telling them what you did not do to them in the past or what you are going to do for them in the future. You will have done the things the American people want you to do, regardless of party. Let us forget about Republicans and Democrats.

Oh, I know how some of you reactionary Republicans voted on the economy bill, the same as I know how some of you reactionary Democrats voted on it. I know how you voted in the special session of Congress when I made the motion to amend and raise the veterans' appropriation $150,000,000 in the independent offices appropriation bill, so that we could give free hospitalization to the soldiers and reasonable disability compensation for our injured veterans. Then some of you Republicans who are now complaining came here and voted with some of the Democrats to defeat that amendment. You could have saved the amendment, because that was a close vote, but you did not do it.

So let us forget about your ancient history. We new Members do not care about that at all; we are concerned with today and tomorrow and not with yesterday. We are not concerned with how or what you did in the past. I am afraid you protest too much on both sides of the aisle and that your consciences tell you you acted as you ought not to have acted, so let us forget it, let the past rest and sign the petition for the Frazier-Lemke bill and for the Patman bill.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. Yes.

Mr. DIES. I gather from the gentleman's remarks that he believes both sides are wrong and he is the only one who is right.

Mr. LEMKE. Oh, no; I say the veterans are right when they ask you to pass the Patman bonus bill, and I say to you that the farmers of this Nation are right when they ask you to pass the Frazier-Lemke bill, when 20 State legislatures have asked you to do it. In fact, one of your States in the South passed two resolutions asking Congress to pass the Frazier-Lemke bill, one in the regular session and one in the special session, and yet not a single Member from that State has signed the petition to discharge the committee and assist us to bring the bill onto the floor for discussion and passage.

A MEMBER. What is that State?

Mr. LEMKE. South Carolina.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. According to an article in the newspaper a great many of my colleagues are on record as wanting to restore the pay to the Federal employees. Those who are sincere in their expressions, if they will go to the Speaker's desk and sign the petition to bring my bill out on the floor to repeal that provision of the Economy Act which takes from the Federal employees their pay; and if they will let me know who they are, and give me their names, I will have them broadcasted and then it will not be necessary for them to deceive their constituents and their record will protect them.

Mr. LEMKE. I may say that I favor whole-heartedly the restoration of the pay cut to the Federal employees—not part but all. We will be asked shortly to make an emergency appropriation of $7,125,000 to aid diplomatic and consular officers because of the depreciation of the dollar abroad. I am opposed to this appropriation until we first restore the pay cut for all Federal employees—until we do justice to all veterans. I am willing to allow this additional appropriation to those in our Foreign Service when justice has been done to those who are here at home who have been hit hardest by the increased cost of living. Many of our consular officers are in other business as well as in the Foreign Service.

Our ambassadors are already getting $17,000 a year and living in embassies—palaces—furnished by the Government and maintained at the expense of the Government. Not only that, but I know from my own personal knowledge that the living expenses in most of these foreign countries is about half of what it is in this country.

We are now asked to raise the salaries of the diplomatic and consular officers indirectly and make an extra allowance for them because of the cheapened dollar. Why not begin with the underpaid employees of the Government? Why always so solicitous of those who least need it? Why take care of the diplomatic boys first and forget all about the protectors of this Nation's honor on foreign battlefields—the veterans? Why forget the hand that feeds the Nation—the farmers?

I know that the gentleman from Texas over there is progressive, and I welcome him to come clean over here to the Cherokee strip. I know that there are some real progressives on both sides of the aisle, so let us all get together for the good of the Nation and forget politics and party affiliations. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I want to bring your thoughts back for a moment to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] on the gold and currency bill. He wished to learn the identity of the author of that bill, and he referred to a newspaper article which gave a picture of President Roosevelt signing the bill and of his jocular question to the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau. He is alleged to have said, "What do you think of the bill, Henry?" or something to that effect. I can see no difference between that and three former Presidents signing bills and then saying, "What do you think of that bill, Andy?" Personally, I prefer the name Henry to that of Andy, but I think we all agree that this bill was the bill of the President of the United States. I think the vast majority of this House, Republicans as well as Democrats, voted for the bill not only because it was the bill of the President of the United States but because each and every one of us knew that 95 percent at least of the people of this country wanted that bill passed, and that if we did not vote for that bill we would jeopardize each and every one of the Member's chances of returning to this body.

I want to recall to your minds that a year ago the great crusader of this country, perhaps the greatest crusader that we know today, that fighting radio priest, Father Charles E. Coughlin, over the air to millions of listeners, advocated practically the very plan that was adopted and the very bill that was written and passed in this Congress.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Is it not a fact that since that bill passed this House that the price of hogs and agricultural products has increased?

Mr. TRUAX. I think they have.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for what I think is a correction?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. My impression is that Father Coughlin in his talks over the radio requested and recommended a 44-cent dollar and not a 59-cent gold dollar, as determined by the President.

Mr. TRUAX. I will say to the gentleman that it has often been stated on the floor of this House, and it was stated yesterday, that major pieces of legislation are always compromises; that each side must give and take; otherwise we would not have major legislation.

I think the great popularity of the President of the United States among most of the common people, among the 96 percent who only own 4 percent of the Nation's wealth, and those are the people I am talking about, is because of the fact that he is the only President in my recollection who has had the courage and the will to tackle the monetary problem at its very base, the gold standard—the gold pagan god of Wall Street.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield for a question.

Mr. MOTT. I want to ask the gentleman seriously whether he believes that the rise in the price of hogs during the last day was on account of the President's signing the gold bill on the day before yesterday?

Mr. TRUAX. In answer to the gentleman's query, I would say that the price was not affected adversely by the signing of the gold bill. I think it was affected favorably, as all other commodities and stocks and bonds were.

This President of ours had the courage to topple this pagan god of the money kings from its throne, we hope, once and for all time. The pagan gods of Buddhism and Brahmanism and Islamism are good gods compared to this Wall Street god of gold. They were immutable gods. They could inflict no harm in themselves. This gold god is a mutable god, and in times of distress, panic, and depression it strikes out with lightninglike rapidity. It uncoils its ugly head from its golden shell. It strikes at the unemployed laborer. It flashes its wicked eyes at the bankrupted farmer and confiscates his property. Certainly the Wall Street pirates, the money kings, wanted to retain this god on its throne. They wanted the gold dollar continued. The gold dollar is the rich man's dollar. It is the only dollar that he can collect usurious interest on. It is the only dollar he can hoard. It is the only dollar he can ship to England for safe-keeping, as many of our millionaires have done.

My friends, when the melancholy note that rises from the harp of time shall hark back to the day when this bill was passed overwhelmingly in this House, it shall be written in letters as unerasable as they are enduring that a second declaration of independence was declared when President Roosevelt signed the gold and currency bill and asked Henry how he thought it would work. The signing of that bill means freedom for 96 percent of the people of this country from the greed and selfishness and larceny and burglary of the 4 percent of the Wall Street crowd who are bleeding to death daily the farmers, the unemployed home owners, and the stricken war veterans. I want to impress upon the Members on the minority side that, as the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE] said, all of this terrible slaughter and bloody butchering of war veterans could have been averted had the minority side not stood up practically solidly for the passage of the Economy Act in the first session of this Congress.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield for a question.

Mr. MOTT. Did the gentleman say the Republicans stood up solidly for the economy bill?

Mr. TRUAX. I said practically solidly.

Mr. MOTT. Does the gentleman contend that more than half of the Republicans voted for the economy bill?

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman contends that a far greater proportion on the minority side voted for the bill than did on the majority side.

Mr. MOTT. I voted against the bill; and my impression is that a majority of the Republicans voted against it and that a great majority of Democrats voted for it, and I think the RECORD will bear that out.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman is wrong, and I refuse to yield further.

Now, we heard a wonderful address yesterday by the gentlewoman from Arizona [Mrs. GREENWAY]. She pleaded with you as she pleaded with me and with both sides to forget partisanship, to join hands, and not talk, talk, talk; and to correct and rectify this great mistake that was made in this House in March 1933. We may talk for days, until this session closes; but during the time we are talking, war veterans are dying by the score every day. They are dying from tuberculosis.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. Not just now. They are dying from other presumptive ailments. They were thrown out of hospitals, as we were told yesterday.

My friends, I want to refer to the so-called "bonus question." I am proud to state that my name is on the petition to bring out the Patman bill. I am not interested in the controversy between the gentleman on my side of the House and the gentleman on the minority side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. TRUAX. I am interested in the war veterans who are not only entitled to the full restoration of compensation, but who are entitled to the payment of the so-called "bonus" now.

No one yet has authority to state that the time is not opportune. To those who make such statements I ask, Where is their authority for making the statement that the time is inopportune? I say we should not wait for somebody else to say, or for some other body to say, "When we say so, you can pass the bonus legislation and not until then."

I am proud to say that my name is on the petition mentioned by the gentleman from North Dakota, the Frazier bill. Mr. Chairman, we are not getting anywhere under the Federal Farm Loan Act. We are only scratching the surface. Loans are being turned down on farms that today are worth $75 an acre because the appraisals are only $25 an acre. It is high time we in this House took action to relieve these distressed war veterans who upheld the honor and glory of their country in its hour of need. [Applause.]

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, the hour has arrived when this Congress must save the American farmer from the plundering confiscation of the money lenders. This Congress must save him from the hyprocrisy, the inefficiency of certain officials in the appraisal division of the Federal land banks. The time has come when Congress must save both farmer and war veteran from further raids by the aristocracy of wealth.

The concentration of wealth and money in the hands of the few has risen to new and shocking peaks during the depression years of 1930–32. A survey of all banking deposits by the Federal Reserve Board discloses that 44 percent of all the money deposited in the banks is owned by one fiftieth of 1 percent of the people. In other words, 25,000 people own nearly one half of all the money, while 120,000,000 own the other half.

Those who vainly endeavor to solve this 12-year-old riddle, What is wrong with the country? will find the answer in the foregoing figures.

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay.

The future of the country rests in the hands of the man whom the common people elected by a tremendous majority. They have faith in him. They know that if he fails to bring order out of chaos, no other President will.

It must be Roosevelt or revolution. It will be the new deal or a dictatorship.

Six million farmers, ten million unemployed, and additional millions of distressed professional and business men are fighting for existence. They are fighting for their homes, their posterity.

The vested interests and their paid mouthpieces are already crying about "Government interference with business", knowing full well that the present crisis was precipitated by Government wet-nursing the money kings, industrial barons, and money lenders.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, it is my belief that the Members on this side of the House, as well as those on the other side of the House, who voted for the gold bill did so because they believed it to be right. I would not vote for any bill I believed was going to work a hardship on the citizens of the United States, or any other country in the world.

Now, if it is true that Mr. Green, the president of the American Federation of Labor, opposed that bill, those who were interested in labor legislation did not obtain that information. Therefore, I wish to go on record, Mr. Chairman, as saying that I voted for the gold bill because I believed it was going to take the masses out of the rut. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct my remarks at this time to the subject of taxation, looking to the cause of the tax burden, a solution of the problem, and a remedy for the greater evil of direct as well as indirect taxes.

In justice and fairness to State legislatures, struggling with the tax problem and for the proper information of the people, it must be realized and understood that the crushing tax burden includes more than the amount of taxes, assessed and collected from the people, measured in money, dollars and cents, more than appropriations and expenditures from the tax funds for the payment of governmental costs and expenses in the administration of State affairs; that the cause of the tax burden involves an economic or industrial problem, a failure of earnings and income, the inability of the people to pay taxes, high taxes, low taxes, or any taxes; that a greater part of the tax burden results from the failure or destruction of the taxpaying power of the people, the same as the failure of the interest-, debt-, and mortgage-paying power, the same as the failure of the buying and consuming power of the people.

And it must be further realized and understood that under our dual form of government, that is, our division and separation of jurisdictions, with certain powers exercised only by Congress and other powers exclusively reserved to the States, State legislatures are without power to act, without power to mitigate the evils, to eradicate the wrongs, to remedy the cause, State legislatures are without power to relieve from the tax burden, from the burden of direct taxes assessed and levied upon the people.

The people have long suffered from unequal and unjust taxes, from burdensome and oppressive taxes. But today we are facing a different tax condition, an unusual, an extraordinary tax condition. Under these present-day tax conditions the people of the country, to meet the tax demands upon them, are being drained of their income. They are being exhausted of their earnings. They are surrendering up the whole of the fruits of their toil and labor. And after exhausting their present income and earnings they are giving up their savings of former years to pay and satisfy the tax demands upon them. They are borrowing money to pay taxes. They are mortgaging their property to pay taxes. They are selling their property at sacrifice sales to meet and pay the taxes assessed upon them.

But this is not all of the tax problem. This is only a part of the tax burden. Even with the complete exhaustion of the people in sacrificing their property, earnings, and income to pay, satisfy, and discharge the taxes against them; even with the people giving up their all, the last cent and farthing of their savings, all they can raise from loans and mortgages and from sacrifice sale of their property, the taxes collected are not enough, not enough to pay and satisfy the tax demands upon the people. With these amounts the people are sacrificing to pay, the taxes are not sufficient to meet the costs of Government. New forms of taxes are being devised. New sources of taxes are being planned or invented to reach further tax resources, to take and exact even more taxes, even still greater taxes, from the people.

It is true that there has been waste and extravagance in the administration of State affairs. It is true that there has been useless duplication and overlapping service in the State. It is true that salaries have been in disproportion to the earnings and income of the people and their means and ability to pay. It is true that the burden of taxation has not been evenly laid upon the people; that intangible wealth and property has not been made to bear its just portion of taxes; that the principle of ability to pay has not been observed and adhered to in the levy and assessment of taxes upon the property of the people.

But while all these many tax abuses and evils complained of today are in a measure, part, and in portion true, yet they have long been true, true long before this tax crisis, and, if remedied and relieved today, this tax burden would remain tomorrow; and while there can be no full adequate tax relief until these tax evils and abuses are remedied and lifted from the people, yet no one of these evils or abuses separately, nor all of them operating together, have brought this sudden intolerable tax burden to fall in crushing weight upon the people of the country like a withering blight in the nighttime, or coming like a grim tax monster devouring and swallowing up the earnings, income, and substance of the people, still unsatisfied and grasping for more. There is something more than the amount of taxes involved here; there is something more than waste and extravagance; there is something more than useless duplication of service; there is something more than salaries of public officials; there is something more than the pay roll of public employees; there is something more than increasing governmental costs involved in this impossible intolerable tax burden. We must look further and deeper for the cause, for the remedy, for the relief from the burden of exhausting taxes.

While these evils and abuses of public waste and extravagance and increasing governmental costs and expenses are responsible for some part of this rising, crushing, multiplying tax burden, the greater part of the tax burden results from the fall of values, the price level, and the wage scale, from the failure of earnings and income, from the destruction of the taxpaying power of the people.

Under these economic and industrial conditions with the tax rate remaining the same, with the tax valuations remaining the same, with the tax levy remaining unchanged, the burden of tax payments, measured in labor and the products of labor, in farm crops, stock, and farm products, in which and from which taxes are paid, taxes have been doubled and tripled upon the people, have been raised, increased, and multiplied upon the people of the country; and today call for double and triple and fivefold the amount of labor and labor products to pay and satisfy the same taxes for double, triple, and fivefold the amount of farm crops, stock, and farm products to pay and satisfy the same taxes. Taxes are not paid in money but, in fact, are paid in labor and the products of labor, in farm crops, stock, and farm products and only measured in money. The money measure for the payment of taxes has been changed, increased, and enlarged, doubling, tripling, and multiplying the burden of taxes required to pay.

Under these abnormal tax conditions, the evils and abuses of waste and extravagance, of increasing governmental costs and expenses are a mere incident of the tax burden and fade away as trifling, as the little things, as the small things, as the trivial things, as the inconsequential things in creating and maintaining the tax burden upon the people, and as compared with the far greater cause of falling values and the price level, of diminishing earnings and income over which State legislatures are without jurisdiction and are powerless to remedy and relieve.

To realize and understand the cause of this oppressive tax burden we must read the story of cruel, frenzied finance, of a deep-laid, premeditated plot; the story of a secret gentleman's agreement entered into with deliberate intent, in wanton disregard to human welfare, to contract and withdraw from circulation the money and credits of the country, the object and purpose of which was to double, triple, and multiply the value of World War obligations, World War debts and bonds, owned, held, or controlled by certain international financiers and manipulating bankers.

I refer to the secret bankers' meeting held May 18, 1920, in Washington, D.C., under the very shadows of the Capitol, and the secret resolution passed in the name and style of "The Orderly Deflation Committee of the American Bankers' Association", calling upon the Federal Reserve Board to contract and withdraw from circulation the money and credits of the country, and to the servient action taken following this secret bankers' meeting by the Federal Reserve officers, led as puppets, dupes, and tools, to raise the discount rate and sell bonds and securities under the open-market operations, all to withdraw money and credits from circulation, contracting the volume and supply of money, forcing down values and the price level, destroying the taxpaying power, as well as the interest-, debt-, and mortgage-paying power and the buying and consuming power of the people, and creating an economic and industrial condition which, for want of understanding, or to prevent an understanding, is called a panic or depression.

The people, struggling, writhing, gasping under the multiplied tax burdens and the failure and destruction of the taxpaying power, and mistaking the abuse of money, forcing down values and the price level, for public waste and extravagance in the administration of state affairs, have been driving State legislatures back to convene in special session and, smarting under the lash of criticism, denunciation, and complaint, members are slashing to reduce their own salaries, which, as compared with the tax burden and the fall of values and the price level, is a mere grain of sand to the weary wastes of the seashore.

And further mistaking the cause of the greater part of the tax burden as resulting from the abuses of the taxing power under the laws and constitution of the State, and laboring under the erroneous impression that all can be remedied and the burden relieved by reducing the amount of taxes measured in money and cutting down appropriations to a bare, scant tax minimum, many public charities of the State, many worthy services performed, many public enterprises contributing to the welfare, happiness, and the progress and advancement of the people will be dwarfed, impoverished, and suspended, will be discontinued, retarded, and thrown back, but all in vain and without relief to people from the tax burden.

State legislatures may call a halt to the building, upkeep, and maintenance of our good road system which has come with the automobile to revolutionize travel and transportation. State legislatures may dwarf and impoverish the sacred common-school system, the pride of the State and the hope of the future. State legislatures may withhold appropriations from our charitable and benevolent institutions, serving to alleviate suffering or to make up for the uneven race of life. State legislatures may withhold funds for the support of the penal and reformatory institutions struggling with the abnormal, the perverted, and criminal insane. State legislatures may carry the strain of economy to stifle all the services of the State and to dwarf all the charities that soothe, heal, and bless and which go hand in hand with the higher considerations of humanity and with human progress and advancement.

But all will be futile and in vain. The sacrifice and denial will be of no avail. The humiliation and retreat will not relieve and the crushing tax burden will remain; because without a rise of values and the price level, taxes will still exhaust the people of their earnings, income, and property and leave them without means with which to provide themselves with the necessaries and comforts to live.

But we need our system of good roads for travel and transportation, which has come to be a vital necessity and as a part of production in our economic and industrial life. We need our advanced school system to prepare and qualify the youth of the land to meet and solve the greater problems of the future, to discharge the higher duties, and assume the greater responsibilities coming to and devolving upon the human race and the generations as they come. We need our benevolent institutions to meet the higher conceptions of humanity and considerations for those left groping in the shadows of a blighted life. We need our reformatories and penal institutions to deal with the abnormal, the perverted, and criminal mind to assure greater safety for property and life and as means and measures for reform. We need all these services and institutions of the State which have come to be indispensable as a part of our lives and being and to keep pace in the march of progress to the planes of a higher and more exalted civilization.

And the people can realize and enjoy all these improved facilities, and all these worthy services of the State, and all these benign institutions dispensing charity and benevolence, providing for relief and reformation, and safeguarding property and human life, and which can only be provided and maintained by the people acting as a collective body organized and cooperating under the forms by means and through the agencies of the State. All these can be realized and enjoyed without strain or burden upon the taxpayers when there is a restoration of values and the price level, of earnings and income, and the taxpaying power. And the people will bear these burdens cheerfully, grateful for the opportunity to pay, and will claim credit and will take just pride in the glory and renown of State achievements, when there is a restoration of the taxpaying power.

Under the fall of values and the price level, the failure of earnings and income and the destruction of the taxpaying power, we are facing an emergency and crisis in the alternative to be met promptly, without hesitation or delay. Under the failure of earnings and income the people cannot pay taxes and live. If they use their earnings and income to provide the necessaries to live, they are left without means or money to pay taxes. If they use their earnings and income with which to pay and satisfy taxes, they are left without means to live. Facing this emergency and crisis, it must be realized and understood that the impulse of men to live and provide for those who by nature are dependent upon them, is higher and more controlling than the obligation to pay taxes; that, under the natural impulse to live, the law of peace, order, and property must give way to the higher law of life, and will give way to the higher law of life when men are forced to choose between the right to live and the obligation to pay taxes.

But unmindful of this crisis and disregarding the higher impulse to live, with the strong arm of the law, under the taxing power, in the collection of taxes, we are taking bread and meat from the hungry, we are taking clothing and fuel from the cold and shivering, we are driving men, women, and children out from the walls and roofs of shelter and protection into the cold, storm, and exposure, we are coercing men to choose between the impulse to live and the obligation to pay taxes. And when men are compelled to choose under the higher law of life they will choose the right to live, they will renounce the tax obligation, they will resist the tax demands upon them, and if pressed and goaded further, they will challenge the sovereignty of the State. This imperative alternate is that the power to pay taxes over earnings and income to live must either be restored back to the people, or the assessment and collection of taxes must be reduced, stopped, or suspended until the power to pay taxes over earnings and income to live is recovered and restored back to them.

Facing this tax crisis and the right of men to live, it is the duty of every legislative assembly and every individual member, under the oath and obligations of office, to enter at once, without hesitation or delay, upon a strenuous and drastic policy of tax economy and retrenchment, first, to eliminate waste and extravagance and every service of the State which can be reduced or temporarily discontinued without irreparable loss or damage, suspending highway and all new construction, and even, to prevent a greater tragedy, the institutions of higher education must be touched with the hand of strenuous, drastic economy, leaving only the primary and common grades and the benevolent and penal institutions last to be reached and reduced in the course of tax reduction. This should not be a permanent policy of taxation, but as a temporary expedient to continue until, and only until, there is a restoration of the taxpaying power over earnings and income to live.

And in the meantime, without waiting, State legislatures should take the initiative to demand of and memorialize Congress to lift the blight of money contraction, to bring a rise of values and the price level and restore the power to pay taxes over earnings and income to live, and should charge the responsibility, and fix the responsibility, and leave the responsibility for this crushing tax burden where it rightfully belongs, on the steps of the National Capitol, at the door of the Federal Congress, alone vested with jurisdiction and power to remedy and relieve, and on a refusal or failure to realize the responsibility and relieve from the tax burden, leave the Federal Congress to face the wrath and indignation of a wronged and outraged people, instead of helpless and dependent State legislatures. [Applause.]

This tax crisis has come upon the people as one of the evils and burdens of this panic. It will continue with the panic. It will be prolonged with the panic. It is a part of the evils and burdens of the panic. And relief from the crushing burdens of taxation can only come with relief from the panic, can only come with the rise of values and the price level, can only come with the restoration of farm earnings and income, with a restoration of the farmer's taxpaying power, as well as his interest-paying power, as well as his debt- and mortgage-paying power, his buying, purchasing, and consuming power.

There can be no relief from this tax burden until there is a restoration of farm values and the price level, until there is a restoration of farm earnings and income, until there is a restoration of the taxpaying power of the people. And there can be no restoration of values and the price levels until there is a restoration of money and credit, of the volume and supply of money in circulation, of the money secretly withdrawn from circulation by the international financiers and manipulating bankers. There can be no relief from this tax burden continuing, existing, and remaining under this panic, while farm values and the price level remain at the present low value and price stage, under which the farmers are compelled to sell, surrender, and give up all, or the most of their crops and stock to pay taxes and interest, leaving them without surplus earnings and income with which to pay debts and mortgages, with which to buy, take, and consume what industrial labor produces.

State legislatures cannot alone deal with the problem to relieve the people of the tax burden. After the legislature has reduced taxes to a bare scant tax minimum, the tax burden will still remain for want of the taxpaying power. For only Congress and the Federal Government can provide complete relief from the tax burden by a restoration of the taxpaying power by a general rise of values and the price level under the control of the volume and supply of money and credit maintained in circulation.

If there was a restoration in values and the price level, a restoration of earnings and income to meet normal prosperity requirements, a restoration of the taxpaying power, as well as the interest- and debt-paying power, and the buying and consuming power of the people, the people would fail to take notice or forget the tax burden, and tax-reform advocates would fail of a hearing for consideration of tax reduction, and agriculture would resume the even tenor of its ways without notice or complaint, and the abuses of the taxing power would fail of consideration so great would be the remedy and so complete would be the relief. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who speak today may have the right to revise and extend their own remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, when I was out of the room the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD] stated that the article from which I read was not an Associated Press dispatch. I wish to correct the gentleman. I understand he is not present, but I understand also, I may say in fairness to him, that he will withdraw his remark. In order, however, to keep the record straight, may I state that I read from the Evening Bulletin, of Philadelphia, with a date line of Washington, D.C., January 30, with the conventional A.P. letters, which stands for an Associated Press report. There is no question about it. The gentleman was wrong. He has agreed to withdraw his remarks before they can be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; but I thought it was only fair to make this statement, because it was an Associated Press report from which I read, and there never was any reason for anyone to contradict it, no matter how extraordinary it may sound unless denied from the White House or the Associated Press itself.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of California. Mr. Chairman, I have been here almost a full term, and I have hesitated to stand here and even attempt to make any sort of talk, much less a speech to my friends in the House, and it is with reluctance and modesty that I do so now. As I listened to the critical remarks emanating from first one side of the House and then the other, and then down the middle aisle, indicating that the Republicans did this, or that the Democrats did that, blaming the Republicans for this or the Democrats for that, I have wondered sometime, and I wonder now, whether or not we are American Congressmen sitting as a branch of the Congress of the United States or whether Republicans and Democrats are something different and apart from American citizens representing American people.

I am under the impression—and I believe you will all eventually come to a full realization of the truth of what I am about to say—that constituents expect us to vote our honest convictions in what we believe to be for the best interests of the American people rather than to follow blindly so-called "party leadership." Incidentally, some of you men may have noted the other day that the Democratic delegation from California, with two exceptions, endorsed for reelection from our State a Republican Senator. And in that connection we endorsed him because we know that he votes his honest convictions in the interest of the people, and therefore we endorsed HIRAM JOHNSON the man—not the Republican—and are proud of the fact that we did. I am likewise under the impression that the people not only in California but also in the whole United States have arrived at the place where they are not interested primarily in either Democrats or Republicans, but are interested in good men to represent them here, irrespective of what party label they may bear. The day is fast disappearing when professional politicians are able to divide our people into two camps and safely say that they will vote as they are registered. As evidence of that fact, let me direct your attention to the fact that Franklin D. Roosevelt defeated Herbert Hoover in his (Hoover's) home State, California, by nearly one half million votes, although the registration showed a clear majority of Republicans over Democrats of nearly one half million. My people voted for Franklin D. Roosevelt the American, not Franklin D. Roosevelt the Democrat.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of California. I yield.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. It seems that California keeps her good men in jail.

Mr. BURKE of California. To whom do you refer?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mooney and Billings.

Mr. BURKE of California. Well, I am not in accord with keeping Mr. Mooney in jail, and I never have been. I have thoroughly studied the records of that case. The dissenting opinion of one judge, whose name I cannot recall at this minute, written in the Billings case upon his application for pardon, absolutely coincides with my views. I may say to the gentleman that a review of the facts of the Billings case by the Supreme Court of California was substantially a review of the Mooney case, and with one exception, as I have heretofore stated, the court indicated that the principal ground for denying pardon was that he had a record at one time or other of having been more or less a dynamiter, and even though there was not any evidence in this case, or at best, slight evidence, and that by admitted or proved perjurers to keep him in jail, he ought to be kept there on general principles or his past reputation. It is most significant that all living members of the jury who convicted Mooney and Billings, and Judge Griffin, who presided at their trial, have without exception expressed the opinion that they are innocent and should be pardoned.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I am glad to hear that and especially glad to have it go into the RECORD.

Mr. BURKE of California. We had a great deal of talk a few minutes since by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] concerning a statement supposed or alleged to have been made by the President at the time he signed the gold bill. Perhaps the President said what the Associated Press report said he did, but you must bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that the present occupant of the White House has a keen sense of humor, something that was most lacking in my distinguished fellow citizen from California, Herbert Hoover. [Applause.]

I do not mean to be unkind in my criticism of Mr. Hoover when I say that he lacks a sense of humor, for I believe this shortcoming in him is readily understandable because of the fact that Mr. Hoover lived in England so long that if he ever had a sense of humor he lost it long before he returned to the United States. [Applause.]

We have an American down there at the end of the Avenue in the White House with a sense of humor which is keen and alive to every situation in which it may be brought into play; a sense of humor the fullness of which has neither been dulled nor diminished by residence in any foreign country; and with that sense of humor he also has in his heart a tremendous spark of human kindness. In other words, he is a man of deep sympathetic feeling for our people, and it is easy for me to appreciate, as it should be for all of you, that our good President may have made the remarks attributed to him in much the same vein as you or I may have made similar remarks. Put yourself in his position, if you please. See if you cannot imagine the feeling of joy that would have overcome you under similar circumstances. I am appealing especially to the members of this committee who are possessed of the same keen sense of humor that he has. The profound joy that must have filled his heart in the realization that he had brought to fruition a movement which he believed was to go so far to ameliorate the suffering of our people, would of necessity in this great man cause him to express the happiness which he felt, and his bantering with Secretary Morgenthau was undoubtedly nothing more or less than the spontaneous expression of the feeling of joy which was then emanating from his heart.

I regret exceedingly that my friend, the very distinguished and able Mr. FISH, is neither unable to appreciate or comprehend the feelings that must have been in the breast of the President at the moment he signed this bill. But since he was neither sympathetic with the bill or possessed of a sense of humor, it is easy for me, who is sympathetic with the bill and as an Irishman, possessed of a keen sense of humor, to appreciate the dialog that took place between the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. I have often said, and I now believe, that the one talent which God could deny a man which was useful to him in making his life more happy, was that talent which enabled him to appreciate and understand the humor of a situation. I hope, therefore, that my good friend from New York, and all who think as he thinks, will not be so foolish as to attempt to use this incident as campaign propaganda hereafter. We all know there is no boomerang that is so disastrous to us as that one which returns and knocks us down. In that connection, let me point out that a man who is of sufficient intelligence and education to make Phi Beta Kappa, is far too intelligent to have made, seriously, the statement that he did not know that which was contained in a bill of so far-reaching importance as this gold bill.

To illustrate further what I have just indicated, let me recount to you an incident which happened years ago in a court room in Los Angeles at a time when I was only a student in law school. I happened to be present in the court room of old Charles Monroe, department 13 of our superior court, which, unlike in the State of New York, is our trial court.

Judge Monroe presided over the divorce court, and he had the idiosyncrasy of taking out of the hands of lawyers the actual trial of uncontested divorce cases. He took the witnesses in hand and examined them in much the same fashion as would a lawyer have examined them had he been appearing for the defendant. But he had the added advantage of both the plaintiff and her attorney, or his attorney, in that he did not allow counsel for plaintiff to examine either the plaintiff or his or her witnesses in any respect. Upon this occasion he was giving a woman client of an old friend of mine a real grilling; and as he pursued his course, the client, by reason of the fact that she was fearful of the judge, arrived at the point where she was getting more or less in deep water. My good friend—by name, Bob Adcock—an old lawyer who stuttered considerably, realizing the fact that his client under the grilling of Judge Monroe was about to talk herself out of court, came to his feet and said: "Judge, I ob-ob-ob-object to this line of examination." Monroe turned to him and in a very high-pitched voice said, "Mr. Adcock, who is trying this case; you or I?" Mr. Adcock answered, "You are, J-j-j-judge; and I hope you don't l-l-l-lose it." [Laughter.] The point I am attempting to make is that this remark by old Bob Adcock was not meant to offend the court but was said purely in a spirit of bantering and good will, and Judge Monroe well understood that to be the case; and if he had not, he would have then and there committed my good friend for contempt of court. And therefore, I say to you, if our good President uttered the remarks attributed to him at the time he signed the gold bill, none of you should get the idea that by reason of such utterance, expressed in a spirit of jocularity and good fun, that he did not and does not understand what the bill was about and what the consequences of its enactment will be.

Discussing the gold bill itself, our good friend from New York [Mr. FISH] said a few minutes ago that the laboring man was going to be the fellow who was going to get the figurative "kick in the pants" as a result of its enactment, and that where the Wall Street money changer to the number of 1 would be seriously affected, 10,000 laborers would be more seriously affected. Since he uttered that bold statement with no argument or reason to support it, let us examine in the light of reason whether or not there is, in fact, any reason to believe that it is true. Let me say to you that such statements as he has made have lead some people to believe—and I have talked to them here in Washington—that if they should go into a store to make a purchase after the gold bill becomes effective that in the event they give the storekeeper a dollar bill that the storekeeper is going to give them change from the dollar on the basis of 59 cents plus, after deducting the price of their purchase. We know this is not true, but some of the opponents of the gold bill are trying to make people think it is true. The laboring man is not going to be injured by this bill. Many of our laborers who had purchased or were purchasing homes or property on the installment plan at property values of 1928 or before had given mortgages or trust deeds for a part of the purchase price. Many had contracted to pay high installments on the mortgage or trust deed and found or are finding that under the appreciated value of the dollar and depreciated value of property under our present economic set-up that they owe more than the present market value of the property itself. In the last 3 or 4 years wages have decreased so much that the ability of the laboring man to pay debts contracted with cheap dollars and credit has disappeared. Those who are fortunate enough to have retained their homes or their farms upon which they have encumbrances are and should be most happy to see the value of the dollar depreciated, thereby appreciating the value of their property and increasing in numerical dollars and daily wage.

It is a well-known fact that in 1928 and prior thereto under inflation that the public and private debt of the United States was no more than it is now, approximately $210,000,000 to $225,000,000. It is also well known that from about 1924 to 1928 the annual income of our people was approximately $90,000,000,000 a year. It is likewise well known that the estimated wealth of this country in the value of the dollar of 1924 to 1928 exceeded $400,000,000,000, and that now by reason of the appreciation in purchasing power of the dollar not only has income depreciated or decreased, if you please, but likewise have the assets of our American people depreciated or decreased to the end that we now find ourselves owing more money in appreciated currency or dollars than our assets are worth measured in such dollars. In other words, we, as a people, are bankrupt, and unless something be done to enable us to pay and discharge depreciated dollar debts with depreciated dollars we will never get out of the woods.

The gentleman from New York will say that this is unfair to the creditor class and to the man who has been prudent and saved his money, and that it is unfair to the man who holds an insurance policy. It is quite evident that the gentleman himself has not, nor has anyone who thinks like him, given the matter serious thought. There is no question in my mind but that the creditor class will get less in purchasing power than they would have received prior to the passage of this bill.

Likewise, I doubt not that he who has hoarded his dollars in banks or strong boxes for the last several years will find that he is unable to purchase as much with his dollars today as he was prior to the passage of this bill. But my friend must realize that dollars numerically mean nothing and represent nothing and that in order to appreciate the real significance of the so-called "gold bill" we must deal in and talk about purchasing power rather than in numerical dollars.

Would the gentleman say that if I borrowed in 1928 a sum—for sake of argument, say, $80—sufficient to purchase a good suit of clothes, that I should repay in 1932 a sum equivalent in purchasing power to that which would purchase two suits of clothes of the same quality and texture and workmanship. Would that be fair to me, the borrower? Or, to reverse the process, if we had depression in 1928 and prosperity in 1932, then, I ask, would it be fair to the lender to borrow $40, a sum necessary to purchase a good suit of clothes and repay in 1932 the same sum, which would only be half the purchase price of the same suit of clothes in quality, texture, and workmanship. Surely it must be apparent to him and to anyone else that this type of monetary structure is deficient in some respects, and it likewise must be apparent to him that this very thing was the cause of many thousands of bank failures in the Middle West during the regime of Herbert Hoover. The banker took deposits of $100,000, loaned the money out upon security then valued as ample security. Over a period of 4 years the security diminished in value solely by the appreciation of the purchasing power of the dollar, with the resultant decline in the value of the security. The depositor demanded a return of depreciated dollars in an equal number of appreciated dollars and had a right so to do. The true economic situation we attempted to remedy by the passage of the controlled money bill must be evident under this state of facts.

This may not be the remedy. Ultimately we may have to go strictly to the commodity dollar—and I am not so sure that we shall not; but at least it is a forward step in an honest attempt to prevent further speculation in money and to give protection at all times both to creditor and debtor.

If I may be pardoned for a personal reference, I never campaigned for office in my life until I became a candidate for the one I now hold, and I probably never will campaign for another one. In my campaign I urged and advocated the enactment of this very principle into law. My people out there are not afraid of it. They would rather have a 50-cent dollar than no dollar at all. They have had neither 50-cent dollars nor any other kind for the last 3 or 4 years. One fellow said to me that he would not care if it took a bushel basket of dollar bills to get a suit of clothes if he only could get some kind to put into the basket.

I am not a great student of economics, but it is my impression that the gold bill should have been the first bill to be passed back in March last, instead of waiting until now. I think if it had been passed, the economy bill and many other bills passed by us in the meantime would have been unnecessary. I believe we put the cart before the horse in failing to enact this measure before any others; but since we failed, then I am happy we have now corrected our error, even at this late date.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of California. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Congress passed a bill that would permit the devaluation and revaluation of the dollar, did they not?

Mr. BURKE of California. I appreciate that; but it was not used, and it was not in this form.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of California. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Does the gentleman not think there should have been added the silver program?

Mr. BURKE of California. I agree with the gentleman, but since I am just one of the new Members of the House, and this is the first time I have felt that as such I should express myself on the floor, I cannot get the silver bill in, but let me say this: The American people are watching the Members of Congress as they have never watched them before. They are not watching to see what we do by reason of the fact that we are elected as Republicans, Democrats, Farmer-Laborites, Socialists, or whatever else we may be, but they are watching us, and they will vote for or against us, not on our party records nor on our records as party men, but on our records as individuals.

We have 11 Democrats and 9 Republicans from the State of California. This is the first time we have ever had that many Democrats. Our people are looking to the 20 Representatives to be 20 representatives of the people—not to be 11 Democrats and 9 Republicans. There is my good old friend, BILL TRAEGER. Bill is a Republican, but I doubt that anyone can defeat him, because he is BILL TRAEGER. The people of his district know that he is honest and faithful, and they vote for him for that reason. He did not win because he was labeled a Republican, nor would he have lost as a Democrat.

I have another man in mind elected from California, elected on the Republican ticket, SAM COLLINS, a personal friend of mine. He is one of the type that would have won on any ticket, because as they believe in BILL TRAEGER the people who had to vote for SAM COLLINS believed in him. His record will indicate that he has voted as a good American Congressman, voting for the good of all the people as he saw it and not as a partisan.

The point I am trying to stress is that you will find that the American people are thoroughly awakened to the fact that they have long been fooled into voting for men because the candidate had a particular party label. Franklin D. Roosevelt would have been President at this hour on any ticket or under any label. The people elected Franklin D. Roosevelt, not the Democratic ticket. I once said that if the leadership of the two big parties should get into unscrupulous hands they could both nominate a figurative pig for which to vote on one side and a similar candidate for which to vote on the other side, and when you voted for either you would elect only a figurative pig. The people of this country have awakened to the fact that men are men, and tickets, labels, nor anything else cannot change them. We will continue to serve here only so long as we are faithful to our obligations; only so long as we exercise our free will and vote our convictions. Our people will not return us to this body because we are able to secure the Democratic nomination in a strong Democratic district or the Republican nomination in a strong Republican district. We are forever to exercise our best judgment and to have the courage to follow that judgment even though we be not in accord with the leaders of our party. We should not, and I am sure no Member here would, ever cast a vote contrary to his honest convictions with the thought that a contrary vote might affect his chances of reelection or might lose to him the support of his party leaders. We are elected for 2 years; let us always feel that we are beaten for reelection before we assume that term or, on the contrary, that we will never seek reelection, and in that spirit go about our official acts. In that event even our subconscious minds will not, unknown to our conscious minds, influence our acts. We will continue here by reason of personal integrity and will fail to continue even though we may choose to do so for want of that integrity irrespective of party affiliations. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I asked the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] for this time in order to state that when we reach the Department of Labor provisions in this bill I am going to offer an amendment raising the amount from $1,590,000 to $3,700,000, which the President and Miss Perkins, the Secretary of Labor, asked through the Budget to be appropriated for the Employment Service throughout the country.

You will remember last session we passed the Wagner-Peyser bill, which provided for cooperation with the States in connection with these employment offices. They have not had enough money to run these offices right. In many of your States, unless this appropriation is raised, where you have no State employment service you will be put in the position of obtaining nothing for your State from the Government, because the object of the bill primarily is to cooperate with those States which have a State employment service and to encourage the setting up of such services.

I talked with Mr. Persons, the Director of unemployment in the Department of Labor, and he informs me that the amount needed for the District of Columbia alone is $700,000. They only received $400,000 last year. This takes care of the entire Employment Service in the District of Columbia, including the farm-placement service.

The appropriation in this bill is $1,500,000 for the entire service all over the country. The Budget asked for $3,700,000; the President wanted this $3,700,000, as did the Secretary of Labor. This is the least that should be expended in order to give proper employment service to all the States in the country. When you cut it down to a million and a half, the first thing you do is to stop the States which have no State employment service from getting anything out of the fund.

The second thing you do is to impair the value of your employment offices in the States which are cooperating, and the third thing you do is wipe out absolutely and completely your veterans' service which is tied up with this employment bill. I may say that I asked Mr. Persons about this today and he states that it leaves the veterans in a pitiful position. In Massachusetts, for instance, we have a State employment service. We are to have offices in Lawrence, Lynn, Boston, Springfield, Lowell, and other places. For that whole district and for any other employment that may be set up, you will have straight employment offices, but you will have just two veterans to cover all of the veterans of the State of Massachusetts.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman has quoted Mr. Persons, the Director of this service. Mr. Persons' statement appears in the record and he there submitted expense tables. The committee assumed that Mr. Persons, at the time he was before the committee, at least knew what he was discussing, and if he has submitted to the gentleman information such as the gentleman has understood and which he has interpreted in dollars and cents, it is entirely at variance with the director's statements before the committee; I think in justice to Mr. Persons, as well as to the gentleman who is now undertaking to quote him, he should ask Mr. Persons to now submit to him a statement showing how he expects to spend $400,000 additional in the District of Columbia over and above what the committee has recommended.

Mr. CONNERY. All right; I shall do that.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Likewise, I would like the gentleman to secure from Mr. Persons a statement as to whether the committee has not allowed every dollar which he stated to the committee would be necessary to establish and carry forward the veterans' placement service. I know the gentleman from Massachusetts would not, under any circumstances, misrepresent any facts——

Mr. CONNERY. No.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And the gentleman is quoting the director of the service whose statement appears in the record in writing and who appeared as many as three or four times before the committee and was permitted to extend his statements as fully as he might desire. I only ask that the gentleman, in connection with his statement, furnish a definite statement in writing from Mr. Persons, the director of this service, as to the several matters communicated to him by Mr. Persons.

Mr. CONNERY. I shall ask him for that this afternoon and read it into the RECORD tomorrow.

I know from my own knowledge, as I have stated, in Massachusetts we have two veterans in this service for the entire State. There should be a veteran separate establishment every place where there is an employment office. The law calls for that specifically.

When we brought out this bill we stressed particularly the matter of a service for the veteran, not because we wanted the veteran taken care of any more than any other unemployed man, but we figured that the disabled veteran is at a great disadvantage in trying to get a position, because the employer, first of all, because of the very fact he is disabled, does not want to employ him. We, therefore, figured we ought to have a veteran in each office whose job would be to secure work for veterans, a man who could go to the employer and explain conditions and get a job for his buddy or comrade, otherwise you would have these veterans going into the regular employment offices and being turned down because they are disabled, or when they would send such men over to a factory or try to secure any kind of job for them they would not pick such men because they are disabled.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Does the gentleman know of any new agencies that have been established under this law which I took so much pleasure in assisting to formulate and pass?

Mr. CONNERY. No; I do not know of any.

Mr. KELLER. I do not know either.

Mr. CONNERY. We have now the same service we had before this law went through but there will be plenty of offices as the States pick up and enter into agreements with the Federal Government.

Mr. KELLER. Yes; and I had one more in my district than I have now. They took one office out and refused to give it back to me. If we are not going to get anything more in the way of service out of it, why should we vote for an increased amount?

Mr. CONNERY. I agree with the gentleman's logic, but I believe the reason given in most of these cases is that they do not have enough money to set up these services.

I shall offer the amendment to which I have referred and will ask Mr. PARSONS for the statement requested by my friend, the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I have decided to take the floor at this time, because there have been so many misleading statements, statements that are not founded on fact, but try to create the impression throughout the country that President Hoover and his administration did not present to the country any constructive program for the relief of the depression that existed here for some time; and, especially, in reply to some statements made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] this morning, relative to the work of the Republican administration.

As you gentlemen will remember, President Hoover, in his first message to the Seventy-second Congress, presented the most complete, constructive program concerning the conditions that existed in this country at that time, and his recommendations for the improvement of such conditions were the most complete and comprehensive that have ever been presented to any American Congress during my service here.

In order that we may have this Republican program definitely before the House, I want to sum up the recommendations that were made by President Hoover at that time and given to the press in a definite statement by the President himself on December 11, 1931, and then I shall leave it to the country to decide whether this was a comprehensive, constructive program or not; and also call your attention to the fact that these recommendations were the basis and suggestion for some of the best features of the recovery program of the present administration.

1. Provision for distress among the unemployed by voluntary organization and united action of local authorities in cooperation with the President's Unemployment Relief Organization, whose appeal for organization and funds has met with a response unparalleled since the war. Almost every locality in the country has reported that it "will take care of its own." In order to assure that there will be no failure to meet problems as they arise, the organization will continue through the winter.

2. Our employers are organized and will continue to give part-time work instead of discharging a portion of their employees. This plan is affording help to several million people who otherwise would have no resources. The Government will continue to aid unemployment over the winter through the large program of Federal construction now in progress. This program represents an expenditure at the rate of over $60,000,000 a month.

3. The strengthening of the Federal Land Bank System in the interest of the farmer.

There was a definite recommendation made by President Hoover over 2½ years ago to strengthen and improve our land bank law, and if the Democratic majority in Congress had given him the support that you are asking us to give President Roosevelt, you would have had the relief to the farmers of the country that you are trying to give now, 2½ years after, and their relief would have been received in time to do them some good, and their recovery would now be well under way.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. When was this program given out?

Mr. SNELL. At the beginning of the Seventy-second Congress, December 1931, nearly 3 years ago.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Why did not you and Mr. Hoover do something in the Seventy-first Congress?

Mr. SNELL. Because conditions calling for this remedy did not then exist. Now, let me proceed, and then I will answer any question you want to ask after I finish my statement.

4. Assistance to home owners, both agricultural and urban, who are in difficulties in securing renewals of mortgages by strengthening the country banks, savings banks, and building-and-loan associations through the creation of a system of home-loan discount banks. By restoring these institutions to normal functioning we will see a revival in employment in new construction.

Two and a half years in advance President Hoover made that recommendation to Congress, and now you claim it is a great achievement of the present administration and brag about what you have done. The only reason that it was not done then was because the Democratic majority would not consider the recommendations. If you had had less interest in politics and more in the welfare of the country, we would have had this benefit long ago.

6. The enlargement under full safeguards of the discount facilities of the Federal Reserve banks in the interest of a more adequate credit system.

7. The creation for the period of the emergency of a Reconstruction Finance Corporation to furnish necessary credit otherwise unobtainable under existing circumstances, and so give confidence to agriculture, to industry, and to labor against further paralyzing influences and shocks, but more especially by the reopening of credit channels which will assure the maintenance and normal working of the commercial fabric.

My friends, the best one of all these commissions that has been set up is the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and that is the only one that this administration claims has not made at least a partial failure in administration. It is the best relief organization that has been set up by any administration at any time, and has given more satisfactory relief to the situation in the whole country than any other. And it is a Republican organization, and everyone knows it. It is the best system that has been set up during the entire period of the depression, and on the whole will cost the country less, and that was Mr. Hoover's suggestion.

8. Assistance to all railroads by protection from unregulated competition, and to the weaker ones by the formation of a credit pool, as authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and by other measures, thus affording security to the bonds held by our insurance companies, our savings banks, and other benevolent trusts, thereby protecting the interest of every family and promoting the recuperation of the railways.

9. The revision of our banking laws so as better to safeguard the depositors.

There is the basis of the banking legislation that was put through in the last session of Congress. Mr. Hoover made that recommendation over 2 years ago. If there is credit for it, it should go to President Hoover and his administration. Did you give that any consideration during his administration when he wanted you to support it? I do not think you did. I never heard anything about it. If it is sound now, it was sound then; but you refused consideration for political reasons.

10. The safeguarding and support of banks through the National Credit Association, which has already given great confidence to bankers and extended their ability to make loans to commerce and industry.

11. The maintenance of the public finance on a sound basis. (a) By drastic economy. (b) Resolute opposition to the enlargement of Federal expenditures until recovery. (c) A temporary increase in taxation, so distributed that the burden may be borne in proportion to ability to pay amongst all groups and in such a fashion as not to retard recovery.

12. The maintenance of the American system of individual initiative and individual and community responsibility.

I want to say to the Members of the House and the country that that is the most constructive, complete-recovery program that has ever been presented during my service by any President to the American Congress. I want further to say that the basis of the great proportion of your recovery acts came from Republican President Hoover, whom you are trying to condemn in the eyes of the people at the present time. There were definite recommendations and he asked for cooperation of a Democratic Congress and did not get it. The depression was on then and I want someone to tell me where was your great interest in the people at that time? I know—you were absolutely unwilling for political reasons to give the chance to a Republican President you are now asking for a Democratic President. Except so far as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is concerned, he never received a particle of cooperation. If you gentlemen had been as patriotic then as you are asking us to be patriotic now, the recovery would have begun a long time ago, and the delay in that is entirely up to you, because you were absolutely responsible for the legislation in this House at that time. [Applause on the Republican side.] I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman has very largely answered what I wanted to get at and that is what he was driving at.

Mr. SNELL. I tried to make it plain that Mr. Hoover presented the most constructive program ever presented by any President to this House and that you Democrats turned it down without consideration.

Mr. KELLER. Oh, I do not agree to that.

Mr. SNELL. You did not pass any of it, did you? The record speaks for itself. It is not a matter of conjecture, it is a matter of fact.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Hoover was inaugurated on March 4, 1929, and I believe the gentleman will admit that the panic commenced in about 6 months. The Republican Party was in power in both House and Senate for 18 months after that, during the hardest time of the panic. I want the gentleman to name one thing that Mr. Hoover did at that time to arrest deflation except to pour in more money at the top where it was not needed.

Mr. SNELL. In the first place, the gentleman's statement is not correct. That was not the hardest time of the panic. The hardest time of the panic has been during the last 3 years, and the gentleman knows it, as does every other man in the House, and if the Democrats had followed out the program as presented by the President, or if he had received any support whatever from the Democratic majority in this House, a part of that program would have been carried out, and the country today would have been further advanced in the general situation and in relief of conditions than it is at the present time.

Mr. PATMAN. I believe the gentleman will admit that the time to arrest a panic is when it commences.

Mr. SNELL. That is a very good general statement to make, but let me tell the gentleman another thing. In the first place, the President never had control of the other body during the time that he was President of the United States, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. PATMAN. What about 1929?

Mr. SNELL. He never had it.

Mr. PATMAN. What about 1930?

Mr. SNELL. He never had it at any time during his Presidency.

Mr. PATMAN. Members of his party were in control of the Senate.

Mr. SNELL. What does the gentleman mean? Does he mean a man who runs on the Republican ticket and votes with and supports the Democrats? I do not call them members of the President's organization, and he never received any support from them.

Mr. PATMAN. Let us take the House. Name one bill that the House passed at the President's request. He had an overwhelming majority here between the day the panic started and for 18 months thereafter, and he did nothing except to pour in more money at the top.

Mr. SNELL. I am certainly surprised at a Democrat finding fault with pouring money into the country. What are you doing now? You are pouring more money into the country than anyone ever dreamed of before, and a great deal of it is wasted, and everyone knows that. As a matter of fact, as soon as the panic developed, and we saw what was doing, he made definite recommendations for changing the situation, and you people absolutely blocked him every step of the way, all of the time, and the RECORD will prove that statement.

Mr. PATMAN. But he did not need our help for 18 months after the panic started, and the gentleman cannot cite one constructive act that this House passed that would have a tendency to arrest the panic.

Mr. SNELL. Just as soon as it got started he gave constructive suggestions, but you would not and never did cooperate.

Mr. BURKE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of California. The gentleman has outlined the program of what the President proposed to do. What concrete legislation did the President propose to Congress, as President Roosevelt has proposed to carry out his program?

Mr. SNELL. Oh, he sent up any number of bills that were never even considered by committees. The economy measure program, I will say to the gentleman, was one of the most important ones, and you have all boasted about it and called it one of your great achievements and he sent it up here and Democrats threw it out of the window without even considering it. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is the best reconstruction agency yet set up, and Mr. Hoover was responsible for it.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Is it not a fact that in the last year of Mr. Hoover's administration this Congress—the House and the Senate—passed an act to relieve the farmer, to lend money to the farmers who were being foreclosed by the hundreds of thousands, and that President Hoover vetoed that relief legislation upon the ground that it was turning the Government into a pawnbroker's shop to lend directly to the farmer?

Mr. SNELL. I cannot answer that directly, so far as that legislation is concerned, because I have forgotten exactly about that, but I know that he made recommendations to extend further credit to the farmer and the home owners of the country, and your own Democratic majority refused to consider it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The President sent down the home-loan bank bill and Congress passed that, and it was an absolute fraud on the public.

Mr. SNELL. That is what the gentleman says, but I do not know whether it was or not.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. For instance, I have a report over in my office which I received yesterday from the home-loan bank showing that 14,000 applications in my district and State were made, and only a few over 1,000 were granted.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman's party has absolute control of that at the present time, and you certainly cannot lay the blame to President Hoover for your own poor administration of the act, and one reason why it has been changed is because you wanted to put out men he appointed and put Democratic administrators in their place, and now you complain of poor administration.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I was not thinking at all about who was in the office. I was thinking about serving the people who are losing their life savings and their homes, which is just as important and more important, I feel, than saving the great corporations of this country. I said on the floor, and the gentleman heard me not once but many times, that the Home Loan Bank Corporation was a fraud upon the public and would remain so until we guaranteed the bonds; and if we do not guarantee the bonds, it will be practically useless except to a few. The many will get no relief, as the mortgagee will not accept the bonds where only the interest is guaranteed.

Mr. SNELL. When you first presented that legislation to the House, why did you not guarantee the bonds, if you knew it?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. You had control at that time.

Mr. SNELL. No; we did not. You passed that.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The President sent the bill down here. Read the RECORD and see how Mr. LUCE, of Massachusetts, and other Republicans opposed my amendments.

Mr. SNELL. Let me tell you one thing more. The gentleman from Missouri is one of the gentlemen in charge of the committee that had to do with the economy program.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Absolutely.

Mr. SNELL. And you turned it down without even a hearing. You turned it down because it came from a Republican President, and you know it. If you had acted on it when you should, you would have saved the country hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Oh, no, no; we had a hearing. We had a hearing.

Mr. SNELL. You never had any hearing that amounted to anything, because you did not intend to act on it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will bring the hearings over here and show you. They are printed.

Mr. SNELL. You turned it down and threw it out of the window, without any consideration, and I suppose you were acting under party orders.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. We did bring it to the floor and gave you a chance to vote on a resolution. When did Mr. Hoover send it down?

Mr. SNELL. You never gave us any chance for consideration. You are culpable on it, and you know it, and everybody else knows it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Hoover sent it to the Congress after he was defeated for office.

Mr. SNELL. That does not make any difference. He sent it here, and you now admit it was in the interest of the American people. That was reason enough for consideration, and you turned it down for political reasons and by so doing denied the benefit accruing to the people from the measure for nearly a year.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. He sent it to the Congress after he was defeated. We thought best to let the man who was elected by the people do the reorganizing. He has done a good job and is not through.

Mr. SNELL. If it was a good law for the people, you ought to have given them the benefit of it a year in advance.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. Is it not a fact that the home-loan bank bill was sent by President Hoover on the first day of the session and it was not passed until the very last day?

Mr. SNELL. Surely. They never gave him any chance whatever. They intended from the very beginning not to allow one of his constructive propositions to be enacted into law, because they were afraid he would get the benefit of it. That is the real truth.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Does the gentleman say that I ever once voted in this House with the thought of my political future? I voted with the Republican majority when you were in power more times than I voted with the Democratic minority, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. SNELL. Well, there is nothing personal about this, but my friend was in charge of the committee and refused to report out the bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. And that was sound judgment. We brought a resolution and presented it to the House and the House passed it, which set aside Mr. Hoover's recommendation.

Mr. SNELL. The record speaks for itself. You refused to give any consideration to his recommendation.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. KLEBERG. The gentleman's memory is probably better about the things that transpired in those days than mine is, but I should like to ask the gentleman if he does not recall numbers of amendments that were suggested to the measures that he refers to, to more or less deliver the goods at the place where the hurt was, rather than at the top. The gentleman mentioned the home-loan-bank proposition. It seemed to me in that connection that the trend was to arrange to take care of the mortgage companies and those that had extended credit, to put them in a condition where they might thrive, and we apparently objected on this side because it did not go to the folks who were really interested?

Mr. SNELL. Now, in reply to the gentleman from Texas, why did you not give us an opportunity to take it up and discuss it on the floor, and if it needed amending, put in the amendments here?

Mr. KLEBERG. We had made available, if my friend recalls——

Mr. SNELL. No, no; you did not bring that in here at all.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] recently made the remark that Mr. Hoover never sent the reorganization bill to Congress until after he was defeated. Are not these the facts, that the Democratic House, under control of Mr. Garner, refused to give him authority to reorganize the Government until the very close of the previous Congress, and that he sent it to the Congress at the very first opportunity when Congress was in session?

Mr. SNELL. That is certainly a correct statement of facts. As a matter of fact, they never gave him a chance to put into force one of his constructive recommendations.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman yield to me again, please?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KLEBERG. I want the gentleman to go back to the record and go into a few of the measures that were adopted, measures sent up by President Hoover, and he will find that in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred in matters that came up with reference to various phases involved, the argument was against the so-called "constructive program", as the gentleman proudly calls it; that he was pouring money in at the top of the funnel rather than beginning at the bottom, where it should go?

Mr. SNELL. Oh, no; we could not do it, because you controlled every committee, and you would not report a single resolution to this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. BACON. I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BURKE of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. BURKE of California. The home owners bill that was passed at the session before this last Congress was the President's own bill, the way it was passed, was it?

Mr. SNELL. I cannot answer that question. It was passed just the night we adjourned. No one knew very much about it. We did not have an opportunity to study it. If the committee had reported it out early in the session, as it should have done, it would have been discussed on the floor of the House and we would have known what we were doing. Everyone of you would have had an opportunity to put in amendments, because we never refused an opportunity to the Members of the House to offer amendments on general legislation.

Mr. BURKE of California. I was not here, but the bill was undoubtedly sent down by the President. You said these measures were sent down to carry out his program, so I assume that was sent down by the President.

Mr. SNELL. Now, during the Republican administration, not all bills were written in the White House, and they did not all come down here with the definite instructions, "You pass them without crossing a 't' or dotting an 'i'", as they do under the present program.

We allowed Congress to think and act for itself occasionally.

Mr. BURKE of California. In any event, can the gentleman tell me one single home loan that was made under the bill passed in that Congress?

Mr. SNELL. No; and I cannot tell the gentleman of one that has been made under the present law either.

Mr. BURKE of California. Well, I can tell the gentleman a lot that have been made under the new law.

Mr. SNELL. I may say to the gentleman that I made application for a friend of mine on one of the best properties upon which an application could possibly be made last July, and up to the 1st of January he had not received his loan. This is under your Democratic administration.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That confirms my statement that the law is faulty. I suggest the gentleman act through Jim Strong and Walter Newton, two former Republican Members of this House with whom he is well acquainted.

Mr. SNELL. I think Jim Strong was forced out by the Democrats, was he not?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. No; he is still a member but no longer treasurer.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. COLMER. Does not the gentleman think that the man in the White House now is doing a pretty good job of it?

Mr. SNELL. It may be pretty good, but I do not approve of everything the gentleman now in the White House is doing, if that is of any use to the gentleman.

Mr. COLMER. Does the gentleman have any reason to believe that former President Hoover would have done a better job than our present President?

Mr. SNELL. I am absolutely sure he would have made a better job of it if he were there. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. COLMER. In any event, does the gentleman from New York think the people of the country are going to believe Hoover could have made a better job of it?

Mr. SNELL. Before they get through with it, they will be entirely satisfied with the recommendations made by President Hoover; and they will be mighty sick about a lot that has taken place under the present administration.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Can the gentleman point to anything in the Hoover administration as a basis for his statement a moment ago that it was a success while he had control of power in the House and the Senate? Did he do a thing?

Mr. SNELL. I point to the statement I have read and put in the RECORD. If the gentleman can dispute these statements, I should like to have him do so.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me once again?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. KLEBERG. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the able presentation of what might be termed "a lost cause."

Mr. SNELL. It may be a lost cause at present, but not forgotten, and will come back.

Mr. KLEBERG. I am wondering if the gentleman does not realize that that is one of the reasons his is a minority party? Now, as a matter of fact, when these things are studied it will be found that most of these proposals were insufficient because they attended to the top part of the plant only, with no reference whatever to the root system.

Mr. SNELL. That is the same old speech you people have continually made time and time again, and there is absolutely no basis for it. It is a political excuse. That is all.

The best part of the program of the gentleman's party was taken from the program presented right here at the recommendation of President Hoover 2 years ago; and the gentleman knows it. But you laid down on it then.

Mr. KLEBERG. Does the gentleman recognize any improvements that have been made in the Reconstruction Finance Act under the present administration?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; there have been several of them.

Mr. KLEBERG. It was finally made useful.

Mr. SNELL. The Democrats found it so useful they were glad to take it over. The fundamental principle of the R.F.C. came from President Hoover, and do not forget it.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman doubtless recalls the scathing arraignment of the R.F.C. made when it was brought up on the floor by Mr. Garner and others because it began at the top instead of at the bottom.

Mr. SNELL. I certainly do; they have made those speeches so many times some of them think it is so.

Mr. GIFFORD. But since the Democratic Party has come into power and has sensed the fact that the responsibility is upon them, they have not advocated any more of these bottom loans, so-called "pawnshop loans", directly to the individual, have they?

Mr. SNELL. It was an entirely different story when the responsibility became theirs.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Was not the entire R.F.C. program, almost letter for letter and word for word, copied from the War Finance Corporation of the Wilson administration?

Mr. SNELL. I think there is some truth in that. There is something in that to a certain extent.

Mr. KELLER. It is every bit true.

Mr. SNELL. It was Mr. Hoover, however, who made the suggestion to Congress, and at his suggestion it was carried out. It is the best program that has been presented, and the gentleman knows it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York 3 additional minutes.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman admits, does he not, that the Republicans were in control of the Senate?

Mr. SNELL. No; I do not, not at any time during the Hoover administration; and they never supported his recommendations. [Applause.] I am glad the gentleman asked me that question. If there is any doubt in his mind, there is none in mine.

Mr. ADAMS. If the program of President Hoover was so salutary and beneficial and would have brought us out of this depression so soon, why would not those Republicans who are now supporting President Roosevelt have supported President Hoover?

Mr. SNELL. I am just telling why. The same situation existed in the House. From the very beginning the majority in the House tried to do things to prevent Hoover from carrying out his program. They did not want him reelected. The same influences controlled the other body, and they never gave him the support to which he was entitled. It is all right for gentlemen to talk to us about patriotism; but I want to know where the patriotism of the Democratic Party was during the last 2 years of the Hoover administration. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. We were chasing prosperity around the corner.

Mr. SNELL. Well, it is still around the corner.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes. We chased it, but we never could catch up with it, but we are closer now to it than we have been since the depression started.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. It is a significant fact that after having a Democratic administration it took the country almost 20 years to forget it.

Mr. SNELL. Surely as long as that. It will take them longer than 20 years to forget this one.

Mr. KNUTSON. They will die of starvation before they forget it.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman seems to be complaining that some Members of the House who were affiliated with his party did not vote with his party. That is the complaint of the gentleman, is it not?

Mr. SNELL. Just to make myself plain, the gentleman said the Republicans had control of the Senate. I say they never had control of the Senate during any time Hoover was President, or at least never gave him any unified support.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. We are now speaking of the House because the gentleman's remarks a few minutes ago had reference to the House. Those Members the gentleman is now referring to as having been affiliated with his party and who did not always vote with his party included in their number Mr. LaGuardia, of New York, did they not?

Mr. SNELL. I do not care to go into personalities in this discussion. I never made any personal allusion to any man or to his individual vote. Anything I say is against the Democratic Party as a whole and not against individuals.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman would include, however, the gentleman from New York, Mr. LaGuardia, in the number that he brings his indictment against?

Mr. SNELL. It is the Democratic Party I am trying to indict, not the gentleman from Alabama or anyone else. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York 2 additional minutes.

I was interested in the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] because we are all cognizant of just what happened. In the first place, the recommendations which the gentleman so strongly stressed were long delayed and not submitted to the House until after the November election of 1932.

Mr. SNELL. I read the recommendations that he gave to Congress the first day that he came before the Seventy-second Congress. This was over a year before he was defeated, and the gentleman will bear that in mind.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I was interested in the very diplomatic and soft language the gentleman used in bringing the indictment against his own party that they did not support Mr. Hoover, and I know he must have included and had in mind the distinguished gentleman from New York, Mr. LaGuardia. But, after the session closed, I recall that those standpat Republicans who were quite bitter in their criticism of Mr. LaGuardia and his votes while in the House endorsed him very strongly for mayor of New York on the Republican ticket.

Mr. SNELL. As long as the gentleman has brought that up, may I say that I endorsed Mr. LaGuardia for mayor of New York?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I wanted to bring it out that the gentleman did.

Mr. SNELL. It has been public information for a long time. I was glad of it, too, and I think he will make a good mayor.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. However, today the gentleman is complaining of what Mr. LaGuardia did as a Member of this House.

Mr. SNELL. I have not made a single reference to Mr. LaGuardia's action in the House. Let me say to the gentleman that I endorsed Mr. LaGuardia, among other reasons because I wanted to defeat Tammany Hall in New York City, which has been the foundation of the Democratic Party in the North ever since I can remember. We did drive a wedge into Tammany Hall, and I was right in believing LaGuardia was the best man to do it.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And the only way in which the gentleman could get the popular vote anywhere was to take from that side one who had often voted with the Democrats and against the gentleman's party; one from that group called "progressive Republicans." LaGuardia's views were usually in accord with the views of the progressive Republican Senators in the last Congress, of whom the gentleman from New York complains.

Mr. SNELL. No; that did not have anything to do with it at all and was entirely beside any question I have discussed here today.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to talk to this body about railroad pensions, because many of my colleagues during the past month have asked me about the progress being made along this line.

In the Seventy-second Congress I had the honor of presenting the first railroad man's pension bill ever presented to this Congress, so far as I know. It was known as the "rank and file bill", written by the Railroad Men's Pension Association. Shortly after this, another bill was introduced by the executives of labor organizations.

Last spring a Senate subcommittee under the leadership of Senator WAGNER granted a hearing on the subject. At that time the railroads were represented, the railroads and the rank-and-file organization were represented, as well as the executives. I was invited to participate and did participate in that hearing, and I recommend these hearings to my colleagues who desire to become well informed on the subject, because the matter was well presented to the committee and has been printed in good shape for your consideration.

After the hearings were over, Senator WAGNER made this suggestion, that the attorney for the rank and file bill, known as the "Hatfield-Keller bill", Mr. Herman Ekern, of Wisconsin, and the attorney for the executives' bill, known as the "Wagner-Crosser bill", Mr. Donald Richberg, should get together and write a new bill, including the best points of both the old bills and new points that were brought out and shown to be necessary at the hearing. Mr. Ekern waited some weeks for a conference with Mr. Richberg. But in the meantime Mr. Richberg had become so busily occupied with other governmental matters as not to be able to work with Mr. Ekern; so Mr. Ekern took the two bills and the hearings and rewrote the original bill into a new bill, which I introduced on March 27, 1933, the special session. The number of that bill is H.R. 4321.

On December 12 I conferred with Senator WAGNER and Mr. Eastman, Coordinator of Railroads, on this subject. At that time it was decided to employ a number of railroad workers, almost entirely men out of jobs, to gather information along certain lines which we found not to have in hand at the time of the hearings. This work has been proceeding from that day to this.

The idea was and is that by gathering further information we can largely perfect the present bill. I may suggest that there will not be a great many changes, because, fundamentally, there is, I believe, entire agreement between what were originally the warring interests over this subject. I hope that when this bill is perfected in committee it may come out as a committee bill with no one man's name attached to it. I shall be more than delighted to have this happen, as well as my colleagues, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], as well as Senator WAGNER and Senator HATFIELD. There is no desire on the part of any of the protagonists of this measure to have any man's name attached to it, but to make it a railroad man's bill for the benefit of the old men who have spent their lifetime in the service of the railroads of this country.

I talked to Mr. Eastman this morning and he hopes to have this information ready about the middle of February. It will then be brought before the committee and a hearing asked. We are very hopeful that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] is chairman, will not only give hearings, but will hold these hearings as rapidly as possible so as to get action at this session of the Congress because I believe that most of the men and women in this body, at least, are anxious that as a part of the work of the new deal we may retire to peaceful life the old men to the number of 120,000 who have worked all these years on the railroads of the country. This, I am sure, will meet the hearty approval of the administration, which is doing so much to meet just these conditions. It will result in presenting 120,000 younger men with jobs, which we very much need at the present time.

I am hopeful, therefore, this measure will not only come up and be heard, but that it will be passed at this session, become a law, and be put into operation. It is not, I trust, a vain hope at all, but one that we will all be glad to join in putting forward and putting over as the law of this land of ours.

It will be done without any cost to the people of this country, because I call your attention to the fact that most of the railroads already have pension systems, although a few have not. The necessity of the case, however, to be met by this law is this: The railroad companies which have these laws already in force and effect, will not at all be affected one way or the other, only the Government will take charge and see that the thing is done for everybody alike all the way down the line, and there is no reason why this should not be done. We want to make it permanent; we want to make it so that when a man starts in he knows what is going to be the result, and not be subject to the will or the caprice of any railroad official or anybody else.

Mr. THOMASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMASON. Is the gentleman's bill the Royster bill, or the bill sponsored by the brotherhoods?

Mr. KELLER. The bill I have introduced at this session of the Congress is the rewritten bill, taking the good points out of both the original rank and file bill and the executives' bill.

Mr. THOMASON. Does Mr. Royster, as well as the brotherhoods, now approve the bill as introduced?

Mr. KELLER. Yes; I am sure they do. The reason I think so is because I know Mr. Royster does, and I believe the brotherhoods do because they have not presented any other bill to replace this rewritten one.

Mr. THOMASON. Is not the gentleman convinced that unless they do come to an agreement there is not much chance of passing the bill?

Mr. KELLER. I do not believe that at all.

Mr. THOMASON. It would at least facilitate the passage of the bill if you could get an agreement between the contending factions.

Mr. KELLER. I think this Congress can make that agreement because we are gathering the information just for that purpose.

Mr. THOMASON. I am friendly to the right kind of bill, but I think it is highly important that the two factions get together.

Mr. KELLER. I think the factions are together. I believe the executives, every one of them, want a railroad man's pension bill and will cooperate with us.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DUNN. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the railroad employees are in favor of the bill he has mentioned?

Mr. KELLER. Oh, yes; 99 percent of them, and I think the other 1 percent——

Mr. DUNN. What is the minimum pension under the bill?

Mr. KELLER. I do not want to take up the provisions of the bill itself, because I have not the time to do that. I have just asked for enough time to show the position of the bill at the present time.

Mr. DUNN. If the railroad employees want the bill, I am in favor of it.

Mr. KELLER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the gentleman from what sources objections to the passage of this bill are coming?

Mr. KELLER. I do not believe there are going to be any objections at all. I do not believe the railroad executives will want to veto it or to stand in the way of its passage. Since the best parts of their bill have been put into this one, I think they will be found in favor of it. I would be astounded if they were not.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for a few moments in order to notify the House that during the reading of the Department of Justice appropriation bill I shall offer the following amendment:

On page 37, line 14, after the figures "744f" strike out the period, insert a comma and the following:
"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the procurement and/or installation in any Federal correctional or penal institution of machinery for the manufacture of metal furniture and/or metal office equipment."

Some of the older Members of the House will recall the fight we had here in the last Congress on this amendment. I might explain that the Director of Federal Prisons would like to install in the Lewisburg Federal Penitentiary, located in the State of Pennsylvania, machinery for the express purpose of manufacturing metal furniture and metal office equipment. This is one of the most highly technical and skilled industries we have in our country. More than 90 percent of it is machine made and there is very little hand labor involved. We fought this out in the last Congress, and on February 25, and on a record roll-call vote, the House by a vote of 262 to 46 voted against installing machinery in the Lewisburg prison for the manufacture of metal office equipment.

A few days ago this House took the position that they were opposed to the Federal Government's manufacturing articles in the new building that is going to be constructed at Reedsville, W.Va., for the manufacture of equipment for our post offices and Federal buildings. I believe they did right when they took this position, and the difference between the proposition I am speaking about now and the one in West Virginia is this: The work of the industry in West Virginia would be performed by free labor, while the work following the installation of machinery in the Lewisburg Penitentiary in Pennsylvania would be performed by prison labor. If it was important that Congress take the position that they should not manufacture any articles in the factory that is going to be constructed at Reedsville, W.Va., with free labor, to go into competition with private industry and private labor, how much more important it is that we take the position that such competition shall not come from prison labor in our Federal penal institutions.

Mr. SHANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. SHANNON. The gentleman refers to a vote taken on this question a few months ago.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. That vote was taken in the last Congress.

Mr. SHANNON. Is the gentleman so gullible as to think that any bureau or board would take a rebuff like that and that it would be final with it? This is really a piece of new legislation, is it not?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. It is.

Mr. SHANNON. It does not belong in this bill?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. This fund will come out of the prisons industry revolving fund, and the law provides that the Director of Federal Prisons can use that money for any purpose he sees fit.

Mr. SHANNON. Does the gentleman not believe it should be brought out into the open and that we should tell just what it is?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I believe it should be, and for that reason I asked for these few minutes this afternoon to notify the House that when we reach that part of the bill I shall offer that amendment, which is the same identical amendment that I offered in the last Congress.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman well remembers the investigation made by the Committee on the Judiciary to try to enact some kind of legislation to keep the prisoners busy? We all realize that something must be done to keep the prisoners busy. As I recall it, the law was passed with a view to having diversified industries in the prisons. I have in my pocket a letter from the superintendent of prisons with reference to the shoe industry. Suppose they do not equip this place with machinery to manufacture metal furniture. Are they going to operate it for some other industry?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I do not know. Because the Federal Government might try it along other lines of industry is no reason why we should permit them to install machinery at Lewisburg Prison.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Was it not the voice of Congress that said that we must have diversified industry in the prisons?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes; but I believe Congress can see its mistakes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri I do not think that they should open up a shoe factory.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If they do not use the money for that purpose, if they do not put the men to work doing something, you would have riots.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. No one wants to see the prisoners work any more than I do, but at the same time our country is passing through an economic depression such as we have never witnessed in the history of our country before.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I fully agree with the gentleman. My views and his are in accord.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman will agree with me that for every institution we establish in our Federal prisons that is coming into direct competition with private industry, we are going to take that much away from free labor and private industry, and, furthermore, as I see it, if I have to take my choice between the law-abiding American citizen who has a family to support and cannot pay his taxes, who is willing to go to work on the C.W.A. and work for a small pittance to keep his family living, and the man in the Federal prison working, I am going to be on the side of the law-abiding American citizen.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Oh, so am I, but I want to say that the gentleman's amendment is faulty because it protects only one industry. He still leaves it open for the revolving fund to be used to buy machinery to go into any other kind of business.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. However, if an attempt is made to install manufacturing machinery in our Federal prisons, to produce goods in competition with free labor and private industry, I will join with the gentleman and fight against it. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that a great majority of the Members of this House are, like myself, fed up with this criticism and these doleful prophecies about the President's failure in his program for the recovery of our country. To begin with, it is not the proper attitude to assume with reference to his measures, and I am going to confine my few remarks to facts about which I know something, and not general speculation. I know that his program is succeeding brilliantly in my State of Oregon and in the Pacific Northwest. My State is a great lumbering and agricultural State. I know that the lumber industry is 50 percent better off today than it was when he was inaugurated. Coming to agriculture, the second great industry, in the matter of wool, the wool growers are getting for their wool more than double what they got a year ago. So far as our wheat industry is concerned, a year ago there was piled up in our State over 40,000,000 bushels of wheat which the farmers could not sell. It would not pay the freight charges into the docks of the city of Portland. Today that wheat is being worked off very rapidly at a price of 77 cents a bushel. A year ago you could not get more than 30 cents for it.

I bring to your attention the enhanced wealth that the Agriculture Adjustment Act has brought to the fruit industry of the Northwest, and what I quote here is not from Government sources. It is from the people themselves who are in charge of the tree-fruit industry. This statement speaks volumes for what the Agricultural Adjustment Act is doing for my constituents. At least $10,000,000 has been earned in enhanced fruit values this season by the control committee of the Northwest fruit industry, of which Mr. Paul A. Scherer, of Medford, Oreg., is president. This large sum represents a conservative comparison of this season's apple, pear, and other tree-fruit prices with last year's, when no marketing control was in effect. The enhanced price of at least 30 cents per box of fruit clearly attributed to the activities of the control committee, when multiplied by 30,000,000 packages of fruit produced in the Pacific Northwest, will show a gain of at least $10,000,000 in better prices for the fruit growers.

I wanted simply to bring this information to the attention of the House and to the country, to see if in some small way we may not silence the croakers. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN] has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] has a lofty purpose in preparing the amendment that he says he will offer to this bill. However, his amendment affects only one industry, and that happens to be in his own district, that of the manufacture of metal furniture. The revolving fund can still be used for the purchase of machinery to engage in any other industry. The amendment will not stop that.

I want to speak now with reference to the shoe factory at Leavenworth. I come from a city which is the greatest shoe-manufacturing center in the world. I have always been in touch with Mr. Bates, Superintendent of Prisons, in reference to the operation of the shoe factory at Leavenworth. Mr. Bates has been most kind, although he goes so far at times I feel he is right on the verge of violating the law in his effort to help private industry. However, this is what happened with reference to the shoe manufacturing at Leavenworth in the last year. He sent me this letter not long ago:

MY DEAR MR. COCHRAN: I am writing you about our shoe-manufacturing operations during the past year.

We continued to operate our shoe factory during the last year in a most conservative manner and have not expanded our production despite the fact that the Government requirements for the type of shoes we manufacture have increased considerably in the past year. We manufactured this year 264,588 pairs of shoes and cleared for purchase in the open market 1,775,935 pairs. In other words, six times as many Government shoes were supplied by outside shoe factories as were furnished by our institutional shoe shop at Leavenworth. We followed this policy despite the fact that only about 20 percent of our inmates at Leavenworth are productively employed and despite the fact also that commercial concerns able to manufacture this type of shoe have been hard pressed to supply the needs of the Government.

You might like to know also that this department is signatory to the prison-labor compact of fair competition which has been approved by the National Recovery Administration and which makes effective in our shops the same restrictions as apply to private manufactures and also prohibits the sale of prison-made goods at less than fair market prices. I am asking the secretary to send you a copy of the compact for your information, as I believe it to be a most significant step forward in the solution of the baffling problems of prison employment.

Sincerely yours,

Under the law he could have made 1,775,935 pairs of shoes if he desired but to help private industry he released this work, with the exception of 264,588 pairs.

That shows that the Superintendent of Prisons is playing the game fairly. He has hardened prisoners that he must put to work. If he does not put them to work they will either go crazy or they will start riots. You cannot keep those men unemployed all the time and still expect them to be quiet. As he says, it is a baffling problem.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has expired.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call to your attention at this time to some opinions that have been handed down by Assistant District Attorney David A. Hart with regard to the new liquor control bill of the District of Columbia.

Personally, I do not like to see a lot of men go to jail, and I do not like to see men made ex-convicts. There have been just four men arrested who happened to be found with a little liquor on them, and they claim that this liquor came from a bootlegger. The intent of this law and the intent of Congress was that if a man bought liquor from a bootlegger for resale purposes, without a stamp, he would be guilty of a felony. The penalty for that is $1,000 fine or up to 5 years in the penitentiary.

We are filling the jails with men who happen to have a bottle on them. Under the new law it is legal for a man to have liquor on him in the District of Columbia if he buys it somewhere else. Congress did not intend that an innocent purchaser should be held responsible if he happened to buy liquor from someone who had violated the law in selling it to him, or who sold him liquor that was not properly labeled or the proper tax having been paid therefor. The legitimate dealer might sell to a customer a bottle of liquor, and if it was proven that the tax had not been paid or that it was bootleg whisky, the man who bought it would be held responsible and could be punished up to 5 years in the penitentiary.

Yesterday there were four of those men arrested, and I think the district attorney has gone outside of his jurisdiction by putting those men in jail and saying that he is going to try them under this new law, and he has interpreted the new law to the effect that they should have from 1 to 5 years in the penitentiary. I think it is time we quit making criminals and ex-convicts in this country, and try to empty some of the penitentiaries that are loaded down with men who happened to be caught with a little whisky on them.

I wanted to call this to the attention of Congress because if we are going to let this thing go on, and if there is not some correction made, we will soon have the jails filled with people who might have bought a drink or two or who might put a couple of drinks in a little flask and have it in their pockets and take it along with them; whisky that was legitimately bought. I do not want to see this go on, and that is why I have called it to the attention of the House.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Did those men buy bootleg liquor to resell it, or just for their own use?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Just for their own use. They happened to be caught with a little liquor on them. I am not speaking on behalf of the fellow who buys it for resale. I am after the bootlegger too, but when an innocent man comes along and buys some liquor and he is subject to this ruling of the assistant district attorney that he can be fined $1,000 or spend from 1 to 5 years in the penitentiary or both, I think it is going a little too far.

At the time this bill was under discussion on this floor the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCORMACK] both discussed this proposition, and through their efforts the words "for sale" were placed in there as an amendment to protect the innocent.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. I recall distinctly what the gentleman says, and it was the deliberate intention and desire of the Congress at that time that the innocent purchaser of liquor should not be arrested, should not be called into court, should not be apprehended by the district attorney or by other officials in the District, unless that so-called "innocent purchaser" had purchased bootleg liquor or bought the liquor for resale purposes.

If he were going to make of himself a distributor or a seller of that commodity or that kind of goods he would, of course, be put into an entirely different class. But Congress expressed itself deliberately and distinctly in that direction; and if the newspaper story is correct—and I am inclined to believe it is—that assistant district attorney is going out of his way and doing something he is not authorized to do. I hope the gentleman's remarks will be called to his attention.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. That was my thought in bringing this up at this time.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the Clerk read out of my time a resolution, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE CARTER COUNTY DEMOCRATIC CENTRAL COMMITTEE, ASSEMBLED IN ARDMORE, OKLA., ON JANUARY 20, 1934

Submitted by Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma

Few times in the history of this Republic have her people and the Democratic Party as much choice for rejoicing and self-praise in a national administration as now. Possessed of that courage and fortitude which carried him forward in a successful fight against dreaded disease; armed with the overwhelming mandate of a hundred and twenty million people; equipped by training, education, and experience, on March 4, 1933, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, the militant Democrat, in a moment of intensity and despair, took the helm of our ship of state. Immediately plunging into the mighty tasks of reconstruction, and economic revolution staring him in the face, with courage and vision such as that possessed by the men whose names are now immortal in our history, he set his face to the east and his mind and heart to the task of dispelling the clouds of gloom, want, hunger, and disaster facing these United States and her people and in a period of time, outstanding for its shortness, he has changed the outlook of life and the hope for the future not only of millions of American men and women who know and have known nothing but the sweat of their brows for their daily bread but likewise of millions of captains of industry, business men in every walk of life, and those whose existence depends upon the return from that which they have been able to accumulate during their lives.

Salvaging the wreck of what remained of a vaunted form of government—the ideal of the civilized world—after 12 years of Republican misrule, misconception, and mismanagement, the present Democratic national administration, under the leadership and following the leadership of President Roosevelt and Vice President Garner, has returned this Government to the people to whom it belongs; has banished greed and selfishness, mistrust and distrust, special privilege and favoritism. All stand alike now and on the same equal footing before the bar of government; the farmer and the laborer has come into his own, likewise the small business man. A broad program of national planning, based upon national needs, already put into operation is slowly but surely making this a government "of the people, by the people, for the people." In a spirit of gratitude, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Carter County Democratic Central Committee, in the convention assembled on this the 20th day of January 1934, heartily endorse, approve, and commend the present national administration and President Roosevelt and Vice President Garner for their outstanding, unselfish, far-sighted, and comprehensive service to their people; be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of this body that the Members of Congress from Oklahoma should, and that it is their patriotic duty to, render full, unselfish, and unstinted cooperation to the President and the national administration in these hours of trial and in the battle which is being successfully waged against the depression brought upon our people by the selfish greed and favoritism of the Republican Party; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished the President and Vice President, the press, and each Member of Congress from this State.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON].

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], Chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, that hearings would begin soon looking toward a correction of the injustices now being done to a certain class of our veterans.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. I failed to hear the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] make that statement on the floor this afternoon. I have tried without success to get a satisfactory answer out of the gentleman from Mississippi as to when he was going to hold a committee meeting, if ever.

Mr. THOMASON. As I understood him, just as soon as the Senate acts on the independent offices bill, if some action is not taken on that bill when it is sent over to the House, then he will begin an independent hearing permitting those of us interested in the matter to appear before his committee. I hope to point out to that committee where some grave injustices are being done.

May I make just this brief statement: I was very much interested in the fine speech made by the gentlewoman from Arizona about a situation we have in the Southwest that many of you people are not acquainted with. There is a high, dry, desert health-giving section in extreme west Texas around El Paso, where I live, as well as the State of New Mexico represented by the gentleman from New Mexico, [Mr. CHAVEZ] and also the State of Arizona represented by the gentlewoman from Arizona [Mrs. GREENWAY], where several thousand tuberculars from every State in the Union have come with the hope that they are going to be cured. El Paso, Albuquerque, Tuscon, and Phoenix are honored to have many of these men among their best citizens.

Now, I have supported the President from the day he was inaugurated; and I remember very well the next to the last paragraph of the message which was sent to Congress on the 10th day of last March. This is the statement to which I refer:

When a great danger threatens our basic security it is my duty to advise the Congress of the way to preserve it. In so doing I must be fair not only to the few but to the many. It is in this spirit that I appeal to you. If the Congress chooses to vest me with this responsibility, it will be exercised in a spirit of justice to all, of sympathy to those who are in need, and of maintaining inviolate the basic welfare of the United States.

I am sure our great President has tried to do this, and I am sure, too, he will continue to when injustices are called to his attention.

Later, when the independent offices bill was up for discussion on the floor of the House, the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], made this significant statement:

I know it is the determination and purpose of the President and his associates in charge of the administration of these laws to do a full measure of sympathetic justice to relieve veterans injured in the service of their country or who are suffering from diseases contracted in the service of their country.

Now, I speak with personal knowledge, Mr. Chairman, when it comes to a very pitiful situation that exists around El Paso, Tex., all over the State of New Mexico, and all over the State of Arizona involving many hundred veterans suffering with tuberculosis. Some of us know what the situation is in a way that others do not. A large percent of the good citizens of the Southwest left other sections of the country to go to that wonderful climate in the hope of regaining health. There are some of us who know what it is to lie for weeks and even months in tuberculosis hospitals. Some of us went there early and have been fortunate in regaining health. That is not true, however, of several thousand who contracted the disease during the war.

In my home city of El Paso, the Government has its great William Beaumont Hospital. Until recently that hospital was full. Today it contains many vacant beds, yet there are many tubercular veterans in my city and district who cannot get in that hospital unless it be a great emergency. It is necessary for them to go to Albuquerque, N.Mex., in the district represented by the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ]. That is 250 miles away and expensive to get there.

Why not let the William Beaumont Hospital be put to full use? There are many local veterans who need hospitalization and would be near their families. I personally know many of them and I know their plight.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am much in sympathy with what the gentleman says. I have men from my own district who are in that territory now trying to get hospitalization. What is it that is holding it up? Should it not be done?

Mr. THOMASON. There is no reason on earth why it should not be done, and I have been trying to get it done. I have men in my city, friends and constituents of mine, veterans with wonderful records of war service, who cannot go to Albuquerque, N.Mex., and the border-line cases could not get in if they should try.

When men get sick and need hospitalization they find themselves without the money to get to the veterans' hospitals because it is far distant, and yet there is a Government hospital in their own that is about half full.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does it require legislation to meet this situation?

Mr. THOMASON. I do not think so, but, somehow or other, regulations to that effect have not been issued.

When the first regulations came out after the economy bill was passed, I contended an injustice was being done Spanish War veterans and also presumptive tubercular veterans. As a result of this, you will recall that a committee from this House was appointed to confer with the President and liberalize the regulations, and I was active in that effort. Later on I was one of the few who supported the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, because that would have given the deserving veterans fairer treatment. There are many presumptive cases in my country to whom an injustice is being done. You cannot figure out this tuberculosis business. The doctors in the East, the doctors throughout the South and elsewhere have done their best, but they do not know. This is an insidious disease that works along through the months and the years until finally there is a serious infection before you know it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I note from what the gentleman says that he is in favor of correcting this situation. May I ask if the gentleman does not believe that Congress should correct this situation if it is not corrected by regulation?

Mr. THOMASON. Yes. These regulations ought to be corrected as to the truly sick and disabled veterans. If they are not corrected by Executive order, then legislation should be enacted. I know, as everyone else knows, that there were some terrible abuses in the law as it heretofore existed. There were many undeserving men on the rolls and this resulted in an injustice to many sick and disabled veterans.

There is another injustice being done many of these men. These people should not at the time they are very sick or having a hemorrhage have to go through a whole bunch of red tape in order to get into a hospital promptly. Not only that, but when it has been developed by competent medical authority that a man has tuberculosis he should get a permanent rating and not be subjected to the worry, wear, and tear of an examination every 3 or 4 months.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman remarked about the many injustices that were done. I asked representatives of the Veterans' Bureau, who I think should know something about this matter, how high the average would be of the so-called "gold-bricker", the man who was getting compensation but should not be getting it. He said 5 percent would be high. Has the gentleman considered that there are thousands and thousands of veterans in the United States who are absolutely and positively disabled today and who would not go near the Veterans' Bureau to ask for anything?

Mr. THOMASON. Perhaps that is so. Every one of us knows men who had no business being on the rolls. Every one of us knows that fraud was practiced in some cases and that some were on the rolls for big sums that should have not been there. I know men who drew many thousand dollars and are in better health than I am. These were the ones that were hurting the cause of the deserving veteran. But this is no reason for punishing the meritorious man.

But when it comes to the sick and disabled tubercular patient in the Southwest, and there are many of them, he is not being treated fairly and justly when they cut his compensation down to the point where he and his family cannot live, and I say the doubt should be resolved in his favor. The burden of proof should be on the Government. Not only that, but this character of cases should be restored to the status they had before the enocomy bill was passed. I expect to vote to amend the law in this regard and also do justice by the Spanish War veterans who have been grossly mistreated. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, we have had all kinds of discussions here today, and one memorial service conducted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] on our late lamented President, Mr. Hoover. There are a lot of other things that could be said about him, but I do not care to disturb the dead. I want to talk to you about something else that I think will be more helpful to some of those now living.

We have heard discussion after discussion with reference to the soldiers' bonus and how we can right the wrongs that have been done to the soldiers of our country. We have had the Patman bill before us. We have had agitation and speech after speech in reference to it. I have done my part in trying to help pass this bill. I want relief to come to these soldiers who should receive money for their adjusted-service certificates. I have devised a plan and introduced a bill that is fair both to the Government and to the soldiers.

We owe the soldiers who were in active service an obligation for bringing about peace to this world of $2,300,000,000. We are forcing these men now to borrow back from that fund by legislation in this Congress, which belongs to them, and compelling them to pay interest on it.

I have introduced a bill—H.R. 3512. This is a very short bill, and is a bill to amend the World War Veterans' Act of 1924, making the adjusted-service certificates issued to World War veterans negotiable, and for other purposes. This bill will cure the whole thing and will give relief to the soldiers, giving them their compensation, and will not require the Government to pay anything at all except the interest until 1945. The bill is short, containing just two or three sections; and in order that you may get the meaning of what I am proposing to do, I will read the bill, so it may go into the RECORD.

The bill reads as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act the adjusted-service certificates issued to the veterans of the World War, under the act of 1924, due and payable in 1945, shall bear interest at the rate of 3½ percent, payable annually by the Treasurer of the United States Government, out of any funds not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. Said adjusted-service certificates are by this act made negotiable and may be negotiated as any other negotiable paper, but shall not be sold for less than their face value.

SEC. 3. Any sale or exchange of said certificate for less than face value is hereby declared void.

SEC. 4. All laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed, and this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Now, as we have it today, here are men who were brave enough and had intelligence enough to go out and fight a world war and win a world victory, and yet they cannot handle that which belongs to them, by selling their bonus certificate. They cannot take that which the Government owes them and sell it. They can borrow on it, but they are required to borrow out of a fund that actually belongs to them.

This bill simply says that these certificates are to be paid in 1945, and they are to bear 3½-percent interest and are made negotiable. They become just like any other Government paper and the soldiers owning them can take them to the bank and get the cash on them because the Government is responsible. It is a debt of the Government, so declared by the Congress, and the soldier ought to get both principal and interest from the National Government.

The bill is now before the Ways and Means Committee. I have gone before that committee and have complied with the rules of the House in asking for consideration of the measure. They say that if it is favored by the administration they will take it up. I went over that committee and went to the President and asked him to consider it in the last Congress.

I received a courteous response.

I hope the measure can be passed by this Congress. We ought to take care of these soldier boys. I may say to you that if you have another conflict and you have to call our men to arms, what are they going to think about the way the Congress has treated them with reference to that which already belongs to them? Would they be willing to go into such a conflict? They gave us service and we should give them their pay.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GLOVER. I yield.

Mr. ALLGOOD. What rate of interest do the soldiers pay on the money they have borrowed? Is it not 4 percent?

Mr. GLOVER. I think so. It is a higher rate than proposed here. This simply reverses it and lets the Government be responsible for the interest instead of the soldier having to pay it.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Why not make it 4 percent?

Mr. GLOVER. I would make it 3 percent if I could, because it ought to be as low as possible in order to take care of both the soldier and the Government.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GREEN. I voted with the gentleman and with other gentlemen of the majority for the payment of the bonus, and it is not my opinion now that the soldiers will ever have to pay this interest, and, as I understand it, the gentleman's bill would cause these bonus certificates to become a Government bond, the same as other Government obligations.

Mr. GLOVER. Yes; and it would not cost the soldier a cent to cash it. He would get the money in cash now and the Government would pay the obligation in 1945 and would only pay 3½-percent interest until that time. This should be done. The Government cannot be hurt. The soldier would be paid his bonus and everybody would be pleased with this soultion of this question.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 3:15 having arrived, the debate hereafter will be confined to the bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the hour of 3:15 having arrived, I propose to discuss the appropriation bill for the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor; but before doing so, may I express my deep appreciation to the chairman of my subcommittee for the courteous and able way in which he has conducted the hearings on this bill? We on the Appropriations Committee pride ourselves that it is the one committee of the House where partisanship does not enter at all, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] has conducted the hearings on this bill in a nonpartisan, courteous, splendid way, and as the ranking minority member I here and now wish to express my appreciation.

This bill carries appropriations for four Departments, and the total savings for the four Departments is a little over $11,000,000 under the estimate of the Budget. However, due to allotments of Civil Works Administration and Public Works Administration, a considerable sum of money has been allocated to these four Departments which does not come under the ordinary Budget or the regular appropriation bill which is now before you.

Some of the appropriations that have been allocated by P.W.A. and C.W.A. have to do with items that probably would have been carried in this bill had they not been allocated from these outside sources. For example, we find that the State Department has been allocated $4,761,000 for the purpose of carrying out the work of the Mexican Boundary Commission. This work has been necessitated by a treaty made with Mexico. We are obligated to go through with it, whether it is allocated from P.W.A. or not, and had P.W.A. not allocated this sum we would have carried it in this bill. Therefore the total savings of some $11,000,000 may not necessarily reflect what this bill might have been had it not been for the allocations from these outside sources.

The Bureau of Prisons in the Department of Justice has received over $1,000,000, and they had been allotted some $800,000 more, and I want to express my appreciation for the splendid spirit of cooperation by the Attorney General and Mr. Sanford Bates, the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, with our committee.

We suggested to Mr. Bates that the $800,000 that had been allocated for some unnecessary work in the Bureau of Prisons had better be saved to the Federal Treasury. He agreed and stated before our committee that he had not insisted upon it, but that it had been allocated to him rather against his best judgment.

And so the matter was taken up with Secretary Ickes, and that amount has been withdrawn from the Public Works allotment. That simply goes to show that a wasteful expenditure has been saved the Treasury by reason of the fact that Congress was in session and the Appropriations Committee was holding hearings. Had we not been in session and had we not been holding hearings, wasteful money that the Bureau of Prisons did not want would have been spent.

Now, I believe it is wise in carrying out the Civil Works Administration that they should not allocate funds from civil works to bureaus of the Government when these bureaus have been denied the activity by Congress. In other words, if departments ask Congress for money and Congress denies them, they should not go through the back door and get the money from the C.W.A.; and the same thing applies to the Public Works program.

Many of the items here are extraordinary and would not have been granted by us in an appropriation bill. Nevertheless they are important and useful, and in view of the emergency we have not interposed objections.

The Coast and Geodetic Survey received quite a large allocation of money to speed up the work of making charts and maps for the Atlantic seaboard. That had been authorized by Congress and the allocation speeded up necessary work and our committee could not take exception to it.

The Bureau of the Census received a sum of money to carry on studies which the Census Bureau had not asked to be made, and we suggested to Mr. Hopkins that these studies were not wanted by the bureau chief and that the funds had better be used for a useful purpose, and so they have been withdrawn. Other studies seemed useful and our committee did not criticize them.

So we must take into consideration the allocation from the Civil Works Administration and the Public Works Administration. You will find them set forth clearly and briefly on pages 2 and 3 of the report by the subcommittee.

Coming to the different Departments, the first Department is the State Department. The work of this Department has been growing at a very considerable rate. The amount carried in this bill is less than the appropriation in 1934 and less than the Bureau of the Budget estimates.

On the other hand, due to the depression throughout the entire world, the work of this Department has enormously increased and yet we have reduced the appropriation of 1934. There has been a reduction of 94 in the personnel in Washington and 65 in the personnel in the Foreign Service. This has been made possible by overtime work and the loyalty on the part of those in the Foreign Service.

There are those who do not appreciate what the Foreign Service of the United States means to the United States. There are 710 men who represent us throughout the world. They are out of touch with Members of Congress; they are out of touch with public opinion back home; their work is done in silence, without glory or publicity, and too often we do not give them the credit that is their due.

And this brings me to a very serious situation in connection with the Service. Due to the depreciation of the dollar, the men in the Foreign Service today are not receiving the salaries, in actual buying power, that the Congress decreed they should have.

They are receiving from 25 to 62 percent less than their salaries would be if paid in this country, due to the depression of the dollar.

This has caused a very serious situation. It was recognized by the President, who asked the Director of the Budget to make a study of it. The result was that the President sent up a supplemental estimate and suggestion that we carry an additional amount in the bill, not only for the State Department but for men in the Foreign Service of the Departments of Commerce, Justice, and Labor, the Agricultural Department, the War Department, and the Navy Department, and for all men in the Foreign Service.

Your Committee on Appropriations decided that this involved new legislation and therefore should not properly go on an appropriation bill. It requires legislative action. Therefore we on the Appropriations Committee have been unable to take care of this very serious situation, but we have called it to the attention of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I understand that committee will hold hearings immediately with a view to bringing in some legislation to remedy this distressful situation.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. At what time were the present salary schedules fixed?

Mr. BACON. They were fixed in 1929 by the bill known as the "Moses-Linthicum bill", which was an amendment to the Rogers bill, passed in 1924.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does the gentleman know whether any effort has been made to discover what the difference was in the cost of living in terms of gold in foreign countries during the period intervening?

Mr. BACON. I think I can answer the gentleman's question. I was coming to that. First, let me describe the present situation and then I shall answer the gentleman's question. As I said, the salary check of the Foreign Service people has been reduced from 25 percent to 62 percent, depending upon the country in which they are serving. The average is about 40 percent. That, of course, includes the 15-percent cut in their salary. When the 15-percent cut in salary was put through for all Government employees it was put through upon the basis that the cost of living in this country had decreased by at least 15 percent, and I believe the President stated it was somewhere around 20 percent. As a matter of fact, those conditions did not prevail in European countries. We have evidence that in practically every country the cost of living had increased, so that when our Foreign Service was forced to take a 15-percent cut in their salaries upon the basis that the cost of living in the United States had gone down, the cost of living in most of the foreign countries had increased from 2 to 5 percent. Therefore, they were at a great disadvantage as compared to the employees of the Government in our own territorial United States. This condition in the Foreign Service has resulted in great disorganization and distress.

In the testimony before the committee—and I hope the Members will read the testimony—are to be found many letters from chiefs of missions, consuls, and so forth, describing in particular the distressful situation that they are in. I do not believe that the Foreign Service should have taken the 15-percent cut, in view of the fact that it was based entirely upon the reduction of the cost of living in the United States, and I might say here that I have not been in favor of that 15-percent cut in the United States, and that if it had not been for the passage of the famous gag rule the other day I would have gladly voted to restore the 15-percent cut to the entire Government service; but that is neither here nor there.

Mr. HENNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. HENNEY. Is it not true that immediately following the deflation of the English pound sterling they increased the salaries of their attachés so as to be comparable to the depreciation of the English pound sterling?

Mr. BACON. That was true for a short period in a few countries. I am talking now of the broad general principle of the entire service, which takes in the Far East, Africa, South America, Australia, and so forth. It is true that for a period those of our service who were in England may have benefited for a short time.

Mr. HENNEY. Oh, the gentleman has misunderstood me. I am speaking of the English foreign service—their own diplomatic service in various countries. As soon as England depreciated the pound sterling she increased the salary of her foreign service to make up for that depreciation in the pound.

Mr. BACON. Oh, that is quite true. It has been said there have been times in our history when, due to the exchange going the other way, some of our people may have gotten a greater sum than the salary given them. That may have been true for certain periods of time in some countries. In 1929 there was a distressful situation throughout the service, and that was before the dollar had gone off, and it was before the depression had really begun. Congress instituted an inquiry and decided that the Foreign Service were underpaid, and due to the Linthicum-Moses bill, there was a certain readjustment made in 1929. As a matter of fact, over a period of years our Foreign Service have been underpaid to the extent that they have been forced, most of them, to go into their own pockets to carry on the work of the United States in foreign parts. I claim that that is un-American, because I think we ought to build up a Foreign Service to attract the able young men of the country who can join it by reason of ability rather than by reason of personal wealth, and I believe that that was the spirit with which the Foreign Service was originated in 1909 under the administration of President Theodore Roosevelt. The Rogers bill was enacted in 1924, and in 1929 the principle therein set out was further recognized by Congress in the Moses-Linthicum bill, and I believe that we ought adequately to pay our men who represent us abroad because the eyes of the world are upon our representatives in foreign parts. We ought to pay them sufficient to represent us so that they do not have to go into their own pockets to keep body and soul alive. Many of them have been doing that, but their own personal incomes, whatever they may have been, have been wiped out by the depression and they are no longer able to call on their private resources to represent the United States Government. The result is that great distress has occurred in the last year. For instance, it has been testified there have been two suicides.

In the testimony are two or three cases of complete mental break-down, leading to insanity, as a result of these conditions. One was the case of a consul who was so worried at his inability to support himself and an invalid mother, who lived with him, that he had such a complete mental break-down he was sent to an asylum.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. I wonder if the gentleman has any statistics or any information as to how many war veterans of the different wars have committed suicide since the passage of the Economy Act?

Mr. BACON. Of course, the gentleman and I may agree on that, too; but that is not what I am discussing at the moment.

Mr. McFARLANE. On the question the gentleman is discussing, of Foreign Service, does the gentleman not believe that according to the figures of the State Department they have great long waiting lines, and none of those gentlemen are being forced to accept this service; if they do not want it, they can resign.

Mr. BACON. That is true; but, of course, the whole intent and spirit of Congress has been to offer a career to able Americans because of their ability and not because of their wealth. That is the kind we want to represent us abroad. We want Americans to represent us abroad because they have the ability, and not because they have private means.

There have been many cases where a consul and members of the foreign service have to send their wives and children home at the expense of their fathers-in-law, because they could not afford to keep them in foreign parts, under those conditions. Many cases of separation of families have occurred. There have been other cases where children have been taken out of school. I recall one place in Spain where the consul had not only to send his wife and children back home to America, but he was forced, by reason of the 60-percent cut in his salary by reason of the depreciated dollar, to take a single room in the slums of the city. It does not make me proud as an American to realize that we are represented in that way.

The hearings are full of testimony like this. When I was in Paris, as I was for 4 days last year on my way through, Ambassador Strauss told me that that morning or the day before a very valued woman, an American clerk and stenographer, had fallen over in the office in a faint. The doctor was called and the doctor said it was a pure and simple case of starvation. The woman was starving herself to get food for her child. She had been in the employ of our Foreign Service for a great many years.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. What salary did that particular person get; do you know?

Mr. BACON. I could not tell the gentleman.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. I was impressed with what the gentleman said, that these positions could be such that they could be filled by young men of ability rather than young men of wealth. After spending most of yesterday trying to get a young man of that kind into the Foreign Service, I am wondering if it is not a sort of a closed corporation, in which the sons and relatives of those who are on the inside are fostered, so that they will be able to take the examinations, and the examinations are made strict to keep out of the service the boys in the Middle West and the ordinary boys.

Mr. BACON. I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken. I think if the gentleman will read the testimony he will find that the men in the Foreign Service come from every one of the 48 States in the Union. He will find that since 1909 everybody who has joined the Foreign Service has joined as the result of a competitive examination. You will find also that there are very few men in the service who have relatives in the service. The list is set forth in the RECORD, and you will be surprised to see how small it is. Of the 710 in the Foreign Service, I believe it is well less than a dozen.

I am bringing this to the attention of the House simply because I hope the Committee on Foreign Affairs would act with promptitude in correcting this situation. We have been unable to correct it ourselves, although the President suggested we should try to, but it would have involved a point of order against our bill, and therefore we did not feel we should bring to this House an appropriation bill that carried legislation.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I do not know whether the gentleman stated what additional appropriation would be required to bring about this increase?

Mr. BACON. The additional appropriation required would have been about $1,300,000 or $1,400,000. The amount allocated would have varied in each country, because the difference in exchange would be different as far as each country is concerned. Of course, a part of that sum would have gone to make up the difference in rent that our Government sometimes has to pay, because we have to pay our rent not in American dollars, but in the currency of the country in which we rent the building.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Of course, this necessary money is not carried in this bill?

Mr. BACON. That money is not carried in this bill. I am taking this opportunity to explain to the Membership of the House the problem, in order that it might speed up the work of the Foreign Affairs Committee in making a study of this problem. It was brought to our attention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] has again expired.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mrs. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I gladly yield to the gentlewoman from California.

Mrs. KAHN. Is it not true that not only is the State Department affected, but the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, the War Department, and the Navy Department?

Mr. BACON. And the Departments of Labor and Justice.

Mrs. KAHN. All have employees who are affected by this depreciation of the currency.

Mr. BACON. The gentlewoman is quite right. Practically every Department has some representative somewhere representing our country. What applies to the State Department applies equally to the others. That is one of the reasons why we could not carry anything in this bill. It would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. It occurs to me in connection with attempt to remedy the situation caused by the revaluing of the gold dollar, there is still an uncertainty that exists there, and if we fix it on a 59-cent basis then we might have to adjust it 9 or 10 percent.

Mr. BACON. Of course the gentleman's statement would be correct if we were going to adjust for a year's basis or a 6 months' basis. In this case, however, the salary checks would be adjusted each month. The fundamental, of course, is that we want to give to each individual in foreign ports what we promised when we fixed his salary rate. We want to give them the same purchasing power wherever they may be that they would have had in this country.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. In order to meet the very situation the gentleman from Pennsylvania apprehends may occur, the estimate submitted to the committee by the President was for a lump sum. This the committee tentatively approved because it understood that perhaps the legislative committee preferred looking into this matter. To take care of the situation the President is shipping gold abroad to meet these varying exchange prices and likewise to meet any unusual conditions that may arise in the future which we cannot now anticipate.

Mr. BACON. The gentleman is quite correct. The President, recognizing the emergency, shipped gold abroad to pay our men in gold in foreign countries during the past summer. But the Treasury does not wish him to continue this policy. They do not wish to ship gold abroad, and this is one reason why we want prompt action; the Treasury wants it.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman has presented a very practical experience of the effect of the disadvantage of the gold bill; that is, it will cost the United States more money to maintain its equipment abroad than it did previously. Now, aside from that I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The administration has recognized Russia and incident to that are the arrangements necessary to establish our relations in Russia. I notice in this connection the present Ambassador is taking with him seven marines to act as chauffeurs who come from a branch of the Government other than the State Department, and also that the Navy Department is furnishing the automobiles to be operated by these marine chauffeurs in connection with the establishing of our relations there. Is this the usual situation abroad or is it unusual?

Mr. BACON. This situation does not exist anywhere else in the service. I may say to the gentleman that I saw the newspaper account, too. When the representatives of the State Department appeared before the subcommittee, however, they stated that they had made no plans and were not ready to submit a plan for the representation of this country in Russia. So, we have no information about it, nor does this bill carry any sum for that representation.

So much for the State Department. I did not mean to dwell so long upon it. It is the great department of peace and international good will. In these troubled times we must build it up, not tear it down.

I wish just briefly to call your attention to one or two other items. I hope the Members will read in the hearings the very excellent and able statement made by Mr. Edgar Hoover, head of the Bureau of Investigation, Department of Justice, in which he tells of the splendid things this Bureau has been doing in suppressing racketeers, crimes, kidnaping, and so forth, particularly in the field of kidnaping. If it had not been for the Bureau of Investigation I doubt if many of these kidnaping cases would have been solved; as it is they have solved practically every one, although all of the people who have been apprehended have not yet been convicted.

I was much interested this morning to find that it was a Bureau of Investigation man in Chicago who arrested that kidnaper they have been after for so long. In other words, since the Bureau of Investigation has come into the picture as a result of the kidnaping bill passed by Congress there have been practically 100 percent arrests and convictions. I therefore, want to pay a real tribute to that very able man who has built up and is at the head of the Bureau of Investigation and the splendid force under him. The entire force have to be either lawyers or certified public accountants and are chosen as a result of competitive examinations.

The Bureau of Prisons is in charge of another exceedingly able governmental servant, Mr. Sanford Bates. He it was who cooperated with us in cutting $800,000 off of the Public Works Administration allocated to his Bureau. Due to the elimination of prohibition there has been a considerable saving in the Bureau of Prisons, because the estimates for next year show a very reduced population for the Federal jails, due to the fact that 65 percent of them heretofore have been prohibition cases, and they do not anticipate they will have such cases in the future. In fact, I estimate throughout this bill that some $12,000,000 plus has been saved from the Department of Justice appropriations due to the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. This was reflected in the reduced appropriations for district attorneys, reduced appropriations for marshals and bailiffs, reduced appropriations for clerical forces throughout the Federal courts, and so forth, as well as the reduction in the Prohibition Unit itself and in the Bureau of Prisons. I think the country will be interested in this figure. Perhaps the chairman of the subcommittee can give us the amount more accurately, but as nearly as I can estimate it by the different items in the bill I make the saving due to prohibition some $13,800,000.

I want also to mention just for a minute the consolidation of the Immigration Service and the Naturalization Service under an exceedingly able man by the name of Colonel MacCormick. Colonel MacCormick has done a great job in saving the Government money by the amalgamation of these two Services; and I want to say here and now that, although he is a Democratic appointee, he has kept politics out of his Department and has refused to appoint in his Department for political reasons, insisting that the Immigration and Naturalization Service shall be strictly under the civil service. This has not been true of some of the other Departments. For example, there were transferred from the Veterans' Bureau some 67 lawyers to defend the Government in veterans' insurance cases. These men had been under the civil service for some 10 years. They were transferred to the Department of Justice, with the result they lost their civil-service status under an Executive order and many of them have been dismissed from the service and others have been appointed from the outside without civil-service examination to take their places. I draw this contrast because the men who were transferred from the Veterans' Bureau to the Department of Justice were told by General Hines that the President had no intention of having them dismissed; that they would be protected in spite of the transfer. But many have been dismissed in spite of a moral right to be protected by their civil-service status.

Just one word about the division that takes care of the antitrust cases in the Department of Justice. There has been an increase in the appropriation for the division that tries antitrust cases, and I think rightly so.

Under the N.R.A. there has been, as you know, a suspension, if you are pleased to call it that, of antitrust laws. There is great danger, however, that the little fellow may be driven to the wall by the big fellow as a result of the N.R.A. and I am glad that this Bureau of the Department of Justice has received an increased appropriation to take care of that situation. I hope the little business man may be protected if his rights are hurt under the antitrust laws by reason of the N.R.A. codes. I am delighted that we have been able to grant the increase in this item that the President asked for.

I have one more item, and this has to do with the Bureau of Fisheries in the Department of Justice. The Bureau of Fisheries appropriations have been greatly cut, both on the Pacific and the Atlantic, and also throughout the country; but they have received a large allotment of P.W.A. money for fish hatcheries throughout the country and, therefore, perhaps the cut is not as significant as would appear on the face of this bill.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FOSS. I have had some experience with the hatcheries in New Hampshire and I note their appropriation was greatly cut.

Mr. BACON. Their appropriation was not greatly cut, but the Director of the Budget impounded a lot of their money and they were seriously handicapped. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FOSS. It has cost money to do that on account of the loss they sustained in suspending operations in the hatchery.

Mr. BACON. The same complaint has come from all over the country, but due to the allotment of P.W.A. funds this condition should not prevail in 1935.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BACON. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. I did not catch what the gentleman said as to the total amount appropriated in this bill. What is the total amount appropriated in this bill for each department? Will the gentleman give this in a general way?

Mr. BACON. I think perhaps the chairman of the committee will go into those things in detail and will give the figures as to each department when he addresses the committee. I will finish with the Bureau of Fisheries and then if I have time I will give the figures, which may be found on page 2 of the report.

The Bureau of Fisheries did get a small item restored or increased. In the North Atlantic territory—and some of my friends from Massachusetts and the New England States will be interested in this—there has been a service in the Bureau of Fisheries to send out men with the fishing fleets to take the eggs from the fish, bring them back to the hatcheries, then finally release the small fish into the ocean. These are all food fish, such as haddock, cod, and fish like that, and it may interest the committee to know that they release and put back into the ocean by this method, which only costs $26,000 to maintain, over a billion fish a year. This means a future food supply for our people. This $26,000 was cut out and we thought the service was so excellent that we took the liberty of restoring it, particularly as the Bureau of Fisheries received such hearty cooperation from the fishermen of the North Atlantic.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield to the gentlemen from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. Does the gentleman know how large those fish are when they are released?

Mr. BACON. I cannot tell the gentlemen offhand, but it appears in the hearings.

Mr. MOTT. Was any statement made in the hearings in regard to the proportion of fish thus released into the ocean that live?

Mr. BACON. Except this, since they have been carrying on this work the food fishes in the North Atlantic have been increasing, and they attribute it directly to this conservation work. This is real conservation work. The fish are not released when they are very small. They are kept in hatcheries at Woods Hole, Gloucester, and Booth Bay in Maine. These three stations have been closed but by reason of this appropriation they will be reopened.

Mr. MOTT. May I ask the gentleman another question, which is a rather incidental one. The gentleman mentioned the fact that the appropriations for fisheries had been cut, but the cut really does not amount to a great deal on account of the fact that they have received P.W.A. money.

Mr. BACON. I may say to the gentleman that we restored a sum for the Pacific coast fisheries as well as the North Atlantic fisheries.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And also for the Mississippi Valley?

Mr. BACON. And also for the Mississippi Valley; for the recovery of food fish due to the overflowing of the rivers in the Mississippi River Valley.

Mr. MOTT. The question I want to ask is whether the gentleman knows the reason for giving P.W.A. or C.W.A. money to these activities, and then curtailing the regular appropriations?

Mr. BACON. I stated at the opening of my remarks that I did not approve of the P.W.A. or C.W.A. giving money to the different departments without a hearing before the Appropriations Committee of the House. The departments have been coming before the House Appropriations Committee for years. We hold exhaustive hearings. This year our hearings began on December 4 and concluded only last week.

Mr. MOTT. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BACON. We go into these things very carefully. If we deny the departments certain money in an effort to make a saving, I do not think they should go through the back door and get money from the C.W.A. or P.W.A. to do what Congress has denied them the opportunity of doing.

Mr. MOTT. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BACON. We have run into a lot of waste in this bill as a result of that procedure, and I for one want to protest against it.

Mr. MOTT. I think from now on whatever money is given to the P.W.A. or the C.W.A. should be properly earmarked so that we know where it goes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman spoke of an allotment by the public works to the Bureau of Fisheries. Did the gentleman take that into account in making up the Budget for the Bureau of Fisheries?

Mr. BACON. No. We did not. That is all extra.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Let me ask the gentleman this: Just what use was made of the money allotted to the Bureau of Fisheries by the P.W.A.? Did it go for construction work?

Mr. BACON. It went for construction, I will say to the gentleman.

I do not want to take up too much of the time of the committee now and I thank the members for their attention. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOZIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 7513, the State and Justice Departments, the judiciary, Commerce and Labor Departments appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, urging the national administration to include in the agricultural relief program prompt and effective relief for the potato-growing industry to the end that the potato farmers may secure a price equal to at least the cost of production plus a reasonable return on investment and labor, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. DUFFY on Jan. 25, 1934, p. 1305, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. COSTIGAN presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

House Memorial No. 5 (by Representatives Bishop, Aspinall, Brownlow, Prather, Calkins, Constantine, Newman, Day, Dameron, Kavanagh, and Palmer)

Whereas at the American Legion convention, held in Chicago last October, a four-point program was adopted, which was a minimum legislation asked of the Congress of the United States in behalf of the ex-service men of the World War; and

Whereas many of the ex-service men are now in serious financial trouble and need of the necessities of life because of lack of employment, and many of them are in need of hospitalization; and

Whereas the present laws are inadequate to properly take care of the ex-service men and the regulations provided under the present laws are forcing many ex-service men to seek charity from the counties, from the State, and from their Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Twenty-ninth General Assembly of the State of Colorado in extraordinary session assembled, That it ratify and approve the principle of the American Legion's four-point program, to wit—

1. That no war veteran disabled in line of duty suffers any reduction of those benefits granted such veterans in the World War veterans' act as in effect prior to March 20, 1933.

2. That hospitalization under Federal Government auspices be afforded all veterans not dishonorably discharged who require hospital treatment and who are not able to reasonably pay for their own treatment.

3. That perpetuation of service connection for all veterans properly granted such service connection, under laws in existence prior to March 20, 1933, be recommended as an item of Legion policy.

4. That the benefits provided for dependents of veterans, as established in the World War veterans' act, be resumed and maintained as the Government's policy and that in no event shall widows and/or dependent children of deceased World War veterans be without Government protection; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of the State of Colorado to the United States Congress be requested to work for the passage of such a measure; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the United States and to the Senators and Representatives of the State of Colorado to the United States Congress.

W. H. TWINING,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
RAY H. TALBOT,
President of the Senate.

Mr. COSTIGAN also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

House Joint Resolution No. 6 (by Representative White)

Whereas it is reported that the Federal Budget for the ensuing year fails to make any provision for the support and maintenance of the United States agricultural field station in Washington County, Colo.; and

Whereas the United States agricultural field station is a most valuable, cooperative adjunct to the national recovery program in helping the farmers to make a living on the farm and thereby relieve the demands on State and national relief agencies, Red Cross, and other forms of charitable relief; and

Whereas the need of the farmers of eastern Colorado is the expansion of the facilities of the United States agricultural field station in order to help to make the farmers more prosperous and self-supporting and less objects of charity, and it is to the best interests of the people of eastern Colorado and the Federal Government to maintain this station on the former basis and to give it full support and cooperation: Be it therefore

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Twenty-ninth General Assembly of the State of Colorado (the senate concurring herein), That a protest against the abandonment of any part of the United States Federal field station in Washington County, Colo., be registered and that Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, Hon. Henry Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, and the Members of the Colorado delegation of Congress be requested to use there utmost influence and endeavors to secure the continuation of the Federal support of the United States field station and that no part of said station be discontinued and instead thereof said station should be given more financial support and cooperation in order that it may render a still greater service and usefulness to the farmers of eastern Colorado and adjoining States; be it further Resolved, That a certified copy of this resolution be forwarded to Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, the Honorable Henry Wallace, and to each Member of the Colorado delegation of Congress.

W. H. TWINING,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
OLLIE E. BANNISTER,
President of the Senate pro tempore ad interim.

FARM BORROWERS' COUNSEL IN LAND BANK DISTRICTS

As in legislative session,

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMPSON. I may say that the reason for the bill is this:

Under the law governing each Federal land bank district loan, the mortgagor whose application for a loan has been denied is bewildered and left without redress except to appeal to the Department at Washington, about which he knows little, if anything. This bill would provide him an attorney for the district, to act for him the same as an attorney appointed by the court for a defendant in a criminal case. Thus, we would avoid the discontent now quite universal, by providing the disappointed farmer with a just, speedy, and effieient means of furnishing additional evidence of the value of his lands, and an opportunity for a re-presentation of his application to the local department.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2597) to establish a farm borrowers' counsel for each Federal land bank district was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

AMENDMENT TO NAVAL CONSTRUCTION BILL

As in legislative session,

Mr. DILL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 6604) to establish the composition of the United States Navy with respect to the categories of vessels limited by the treaties signed at Washington,

February 6, 1922, and at London, April 22, 1930, at the limits prescribed by those treaties; to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels; and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

As in legislative session,

Mr. WHEELER and Mr. FRAZIER submitted an amendment proposing to strike out in the Interior Department appropriation bill the matter commencing with line 2 on page 10, down to and including line 10, on page 45, and to insert in lieu thereof an amended substitute covering appropriations for the Bureau of Indian Affairs, intended to be proposed by them to House bill 6951, the Interior Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRAZIER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 6951, the Interior Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 39, line 5, after the figures "$39,405", to insert the following: "Consolidated Chippewa, $5,000, to be used for establishing a system of cooperative marketing for Indian crops, including wild rice, berries, fish, and furs; in all, $44,405."

Line 21, change the figures "$346,835" to "$351,835."

ADDITIONAL CLERICAL ASSISTANCE FOR SENATORS

As in legislative session,

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. At the request of a large number of Senators who have repeatedly stated to me that they are simply overwhelmed with mail coming to their offices and that they require additional clerical assistance, I am submitting a resolution, to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, providing that each Senator, except Senators who are chairmen of committees, and who have more than four clerks, and so forth, be authorized to appoint an additional clerk, the theory of the resolution being that those of us who are committee chairmen, and have an additional clerk on account of that fact, would not be affected by this resolution.

I ask leave to submit the resolution and have it referred as I have stated.

There being no objection, the resolution (S.Res. 167) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That each Senator, except Senators who are chairmen of committees and who have more than four clerks, including committee clerks, is authorized to appoint one additional clerk to serve until the expiration of the present session of the Congress, and to be paid a salary at the rate of $—— per annum out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

THE ALASKA RAILROAD

As in legislative session,

Mr. BONE submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 170), which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs:

Resolved, That a special select committee of 3 Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, 2 from the majority political party and 1 from the minority political party, is authorized and directed to investigate the operations, economic situation, and prospects of the Alaska Railroad, and to report to Congress as soon as practicable the results of such investigation, together with its recommendations for legislation in connection therewith.

For the purposes of this resolution such committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places (in the continental United States and in Alaska) during the sessions and recesses of the Senate until January 1, 1935, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony, and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $7,500, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

STUDIES OF THE GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

On motion of Mr. PITTMAN, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That 100 copies of Senate Document No. 116, parts 1, 2, 3, and 4, relating to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway be printed, without illustrations, for the use of the Senate.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF LOUISIANA PROPAGANDA

As in legislative session,

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, Senate Resolution 158 was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Under the rules of the Senate that committee has no jurisdiction over the question of the appointment of a committee to conduct an investigation until the proper standing committee of the Senate shall have passed upon and approved the resolution. The resolution was improperly referred first to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It should be, in my opinion, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I, therefore, move that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate be discharged from the further consideration of Senate Resolution 158, and that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL PETROLEUM EXPOSITION AT TULSA, OKLA.

As in legislative session,

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to call from the table Senate Joint Resolution No. 80. I will say to the Senate that it simply authorizes the President of the United States to invite foreign nations to send delegates to the Internaional Petroleum Exposition which takes place in Tulsa, Okla., in the month of May. It involves no appropriation and is word for word identical with a resolution passed in the last Congress, Public Resolution, No. 71. A similar joint resolution has been passed from year to year preliminary to the holding of the exposition.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 80) authorizing the President to invite the States of the Union and foreign countries to participate in the International Petroleum Exposition at Tulsa, Okla., to be held May 12 to May 19, 1934, inclusive, was read, considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is authorized to invite by proclamation, or in such other manner as he may deem proper, the States of the Union and all foreign countries to participate in the proposed International Petroleum Exposition, to be held at Tulsa, Okla., from May 12 to May 19, 1934, inclusive, for the purpose of exhibiting samples of fabricated and raw products of all countries used in the petroleum industry and bringing together buyers and sellers for promotion of trade and commerce in such products.

SEC. 2. All articles that shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at the International Petroleum Exposition upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty shall be admitted free of the payment of duty, customs, fees, or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during the exhibition to sell any goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That all such articles when sold or withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed upon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of withdrawal; and on such articles which shall have suffered diminution or deterioration from incidental handling and necessary exposure, the duty, if paid, shall be assessed according to the appraised value at the time of withdrawal for consumption or use, and the penalties prescribed by law shall be enforced against any person guilty of any illegal sale, use, or withdrawal.

SEC. 3. That the Government of the United States is not by this resolution obligated to any expense in connection with the holding of such exposition and is not hereafter to be obligated other than for suitable representation thereat.

RENTAL CONDITIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA (S.DOC. NO. 125)

As in legislative session,

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia were authorized to have a survey made of rent conditions, and so forth, and the matter was referred to the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia. That commission has submitted a report of investigation of facts relating to the cost and character of housing in rented premises in the District of Columbia, and complaints in relation thereto, as directed by Senate Resolution 86, dated June 6, calendar day June 7, 1933, Seventy-third Congress. It seems to me, Mr. President, the report is of such importance and value that it should be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be printed as a Senate document.

PROPOSED ANTILYNCHING LEGISLATION

As in legislative session,

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, on January 4 of this year, the first day of the present session for the introduction of measures, the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and I, as cosponsors, presented for the consideration of the Senate an antilynching measure. A similar bill has since been introduced in the House of Representatives by a prominent Member of that body, Representative FORD, of California.

Members of the Senate are doubtless aware that it is the intention of those who here support this measure to press for its passage during the present session. Certainly, no hour in our history has been so favorable to such an enactment or so conscious of its commanding justice and wisdom. The President of the United States within recent months has twice publicly and eloquently drawn attention to the critical issues involved, including the threat against civilization latent in the unbridled lawlessness which contemptuously defies society and enthrones limitless cruelty and brutality.

It is not my intention at this time to address the Senate on the subject, but it will doubtless be useful to draw attention, in advance of the public hearings soon to be held, to some evidences of public judgment in favor of the enactment of Federal antilynching legislation.

The press of the country has already revealed an impressive volume of public opinion calling for action in this long-neglected legislative field. As samples of the supporting sentiment in America, I send to the desk, and ask to have read by the clerk, a resolution recently adopted by the City Council of Cleveland, Ohio, which does honor to that community long known for its progressive leadership.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The following resolution was adopted by the Council of the City of Cleveland, December 11, 1933:

Resolution requesting the President of the United States to recommend the enactment of a Federal antilynching law and petitioning Congress to enact an antilynching law.

Whereas more than 27 citizens of the United States in widely scattered sections of the country have been lynched thus far this year, being a great increase over last year, causing public expression of condemnation thereof to be made throughout the land; and

Whereas lynching is an unlawful deprivation of the rights of citizens to the protection of article VI of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which reads as follows:

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the States and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

Article XIV of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States of America, which reads, in part, as follows:

"Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."; and

Whereas lynching and mob violence tend to promote a general disregard for law and order and to undermine the very purpose and stability of government, and has a deteriorative effect both upon the people participating therein and the community wherein same occurs; and

Whereas this resolution constitutes an emergency in that the same provides for the usual daily operation of a municipal department: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Council of the City of Cleveland, Ohio, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, requested to include a plea and recommendation for enactment of a Federal antilynching law in his first message to the next session of Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, petitioned to enact an antilynching law at its next session; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, and the Senators and Congressmen from the State of Ohio, who are hereby respectfully requested to aid in carrying out the purposes of this resolution.

That this resolution is hereby declared to be an emergency measure and, provided it receives the affirmative vote of two thirds of all the members elected to council, it shall take effect and be in force immediately upon its passage and its approval by the mayor; otherwise it shall take effect and be in force at the earliest time allowed by law.

Adopted December 11, 1933.

HERMAN H. FINKLE,
President of Council pro tempore.
F. W. THOMAS,
Clerk of Council.

Effective December 19, 1933.
Approved by the mayor, December 19, 1933.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, in connection with the resolution which has just been read, and following it, as part of my remarks, I further ask leave to have incorporated in the RECORD, in the order in which they are named, an able and suggestive article by the noted journalist, H. L. Mencken, on the proposed legislation which appeared in the Baltimore Evening Sun of January 15, 1934; an Associated Press dispatch from Atlanta, Ga., of January 9, 1934, entitled "White Women Demand Stop to Lynching"; and an editorial from the New York World-Telegram of January 18, 1934, incisively commenting on the action and statement of the southern women mentioned in the dispatch of January 9, 1934.

Mr. President, I further request that, following these published expressions, a copy of the antilynching bill (S. 1978) be also inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Baltimore (Md.) Evening Sun of Jan. 15, 1934]

THE COSTIGAN-WAGNER BILL

By H. L. Mencken

I

The essence of the antilynching bill introduced in the Senate on January 4 by Senator COSTIGAN, of Colorado, and Senator WAGNER, of New York, lies in its transfer of jurisdiction from the State courts to the Federal courts. That transfer does not follow a lynching automatically; it follows only in case the State authorities show an incapacity or unwillingness to track down and punish the lynchers. If they are not apprehended or indicted within 30 days, or there is indication otherwise of a failure diligently to prosecute them, the nearest Federal district court may assume that there is prima facie evidence of failure, neglect, or refusal, and proceed to issue warrants for the lynchers and try them in accordance with the laws of the State.

It will be noted that lynching itself is not made a Federal offense. It is defined as the act of any "mob or riotous assemblage composed of three or more persons acting in concert, without authority of law, for the purpose of depriving any person of his life, or doing him physical injury"; but the butchery of the victim, if he is butchered, remains ordinary murder under the State law, and his manhandling, if he is not killed, remains ordinary assault and battery. Thus lynching is left in the category of common crime, where it manifestly belongs. Every person concerned may be prosecuted separately and as if he had done the crime alone. He gains nothing by being in a mob.

But the failure, neglect, or refusal of the law officers concerned is made a Federal offense, and defined as a denial of that equal protection of the laws which is guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment. Any State officer who fails to make all diligent efforts to protect an individual against lynchers, or who fails, neglects, or refuses to perform his duty in apprehending, keeping in custody, or prosecuting to final judgment all persons participating in a lynching is guilty of a felony and may be fined not more than $5,000 or sent to prison for not more than 5 years, or both. If it appears that he actually conspired, combined, and confederated with the lynchers, he may be imprisoned for life.

II

Obviously, this bill has teeth in it. It lays no blame and no penalty on the honest officer who tries to do his duty but is overcome by the mob, but it fetches the fraud who offers only a formal defense, or who turns over his prisoner without any defense at all. Moreover, it is wide enough to take in district attorneys as well as sheriffs and jailers, and is even, I suspect, wide enough to take in judges. Any functionary, high or low, who is charged with the duty of apprehending, keeping in custody, or prosecuting any person concerned in a lynching may be brought to book, and if it appears that he failed in, neglected, or refused that duty, he may be sent to prison.

There is further provision for damages for the heirs of the victim, collectable by a proceeding in the nearest Federal court against the offending county, or, if two counties be concerned, against them jointly and severally. The amount fixed is $10,000, and it is payable to the victim's wife and children, if he has any, or to his dependent parents. If he has no relatives, the money is to be paid into the United States Treasury. In any event, the suit for it shall be brought and prosecuted by the district attorney of the United States, and in case there is a judgment and it is not met, the Federal marshal may levy upon any property of the county, or the appropriate county officers may be haled before the Federal judge and jailed for contempt.

There is nothing in the bill about damages for persons who are manhandled by a mob but not killed. This seems to have been an oversight, and I assume that Senators COSTIGAN and WAGNER will remedy it when their attention is called to it. Certainly a man who survives an attempt to lynch him, as sometimes happens, should have damages, and equally certainly there should be damages for the man who is merely roughed. Such assaults, like actual lynchings, are seldom possible without the connivance of the county officers. Finally, the bill makes a Federal offense of any act in violation of the rights of a citizen or subject of a foreign country secured to such citizen or subject by treaty between the United States and such foreign country, but only to the extent that the act is punishable under the laws of the State in which it is committed.

III

The merits of this proposed law are plain enough. It avoids the error, so often made in State antilynching statutes, of erecting lynching into a special crime, distinct from ordinary homicide. That device, obviously, can only work in favor of the lynchers. Under the Costigan-Wagner bill they are put on all fours with common murderers, and are liable to capital punishment in States where it is inflicted, and to life imprisonment in the rest. These heavy penalties will not only tend to dissuade the village bullies and morons who perpetrate nearly all lynchings; they will also make it crystal clear that lynching is not to be defended any more as a mere aberration of public spirit, but is murder plain and unadulterated.

Another excellent provision is that which throws responsibility directly on the local enforcement officers, including especially the district attorney, and punishes them severely for neglect of duty. If, as I have suggested, the net is wide enough to take in judges also, so much the better. In at least four cases out of five the criminals who carry off a lynching are known to every man, woman, and child within 20 miles of the scene. The local sheriff, if he wanted to, could easily jail them, and the local district attorney could bring them to trial. Unfortunately, both officers, with their eyes on the next election, usually evade their duty, and it is seldom that the local judge urges them to it, for he is commonly a timorous professional job holder just as they are.

When he is anything better the lynchers are quickly brought to justice. I point, for example, to the case of Judge Neill A. Sinclair of North Carolina. In Judge Sinclair's circuit, during the Ku Klux pestilence of 6 or 8 years ago, there were many atrocities upon helpless persons, and the local officers commonly failed to proceed against the criminals, making the usual excuse that convictions would be impossible. But Judge Sinclair refused to tolerate any such mockery of justice. Instead, he ordered the local sheriffs, on pain of summary jailing for contempt, to bring in the culprits, the local grand juries to indict them, and the local State's attorneys to prosecute them vigorously. With his honor's steely eye upon the jury box and witness stand, the accused were convicted by the carload and sent to prison for long terms, and Ku Kluxry promptly adjourned.

IV

What an honest and competent State judge thus achieved might be done just as well, and no doubt much easier, by Federal judges. They sit ordinarily in large cities, and have at their disposal grand and petit juries made up, not of village loafers but of city men of the better class, not many of whom have any sympathy with assassins. The prosecuting attorney who works with them is not a neighborhood Buzfuz itching for higher office, as in so many of the county courts, but a lawyer of some ability and dignity. And this prosecuting attorney has at his disposal, for searching out evidence, the whole detective force of the Department of Justice, composed of men who are not afraid of criminals and do not hesitate to shoot when they are molested.

To be sure, it is the custom for a Federal court, in trying local cases, to move into some convenient county town, mainly for the purpose of saving the traveling expenses of witnesses. But it commonly keeps to its home grounds for the trial of cases of any magnitude, and so far as I know it is not required to go on circuit at any time if it prefers not. In any event, its prosecuting officer remains the same, and it uses the same city grand jury and has the aid of the same Federal police. Even the rustic petit juries, facing it, know that the judge on the bench is something far different from the local Dogberry, who is probably known to most of the jurymen by his first name, and has in his time solicited the votes of all the rest. Federal judges sometimes know less law than they ought to know, and show other lamentable defects, but they are at least out of politics, and it is rare for one of them to be lacking in either personal assurance or professional zeal.

Thus the Costigan-Wagner bill had better be taken seriously in the Bible Belt. It was drawn by two of the best lawyers in the Senate, and has long teeth, some of them ground to a razor edge. That President Roosevelt is behind it is very likely, for he has twice denounced lynching in plain terms. Unless the friends of the great evangelical sacrament get busy promptly it may very well slip through the Senate and House. I advise the boosters of Moronia Felix, both clerical and lay, to call meetings of moral protest at once. If they dally they may be damned.

WHITE WOMEN DEMAND STOP TO LYNCHINGS—CALL ON ROOSEVELT TO HELP ERADICATE EVIL RAMPANT IN SOUTH

ATLANTA, January 9.—Aroused by the lynching spirit, a conference of Southern white women adopted a resolution today requesting President Roosevelt and their Governors and Congressmen to work out a cooperative plan between the Federal and State Governments in eradicating this evil.

This action was taken after the conference formally asserted that "Past experience has demonstrated that State and local authorities and public opinion, on which they depend, have failed to bring to justice members of lynching mobs, in spite of the fact that their identity was well known."

RESENT COERCION

The women made it plain they did not want to shift responsibility for stamping out lynching from the State government entirely to the Federal Government. Some voiced the opinion that the proposed Federal antilynching law now before the Senate appeared to coerce the States. The thought was expressed that it would be better for cooperation between Federal and State Governments in fighting lynching.

The bill by Senators COSTIGAN (D.), Colorado, and WAGNER (D.), New York, contains a clause which would forfeit in each county where lynching occurred $10,000 to the family of the victim.

BARRIER TO ENFORCEMENT

It was this which some thought would prove a barrier to enforcement of the law, even were it adopted, especially should the Federal Government undertake to levy upon the property of the county, were the forfeit not paid.

The resolution also condemned lack of equal educational opportunity for the races and expressed as the sense of the meeting that the crime of lynching is a logical result in a community that arbitrarily segregates a race in unsanitary sections; that exploits and intimidates the weaker element for economic gain; and denies an equal voice in control of government to any fit and proper citizens because of race.

[From the New York World-Telegram of Jan. 18, 1934]

SOUTHERN WOMEN SPEAK

In Atlanta recently the Conference of Southern White Women for the Prevention of Lynching passed resolutions calling on President Roosevelt to work with Governors and Congressmen to eradicate this evil. It was this conference that 4 years ago served notice on men that they hold no commission to protect the honor and virtue of southern women by means of mob murders.

With a membership of some 1,000,000 white women in 11 Southern States, the conference can be said to speak for southern women rather generally.

The conference did not specifically endorse the pending Wagner-Costigan bill providing for Federal intervention to halt lynchings. But there is argument for such a measure in the conference's statement that—

"Past experience has demonstrated that State and local authorities and the public opinion behind them have failed to bring to justice members of lynching mobs, although their identities have been known."

The Federal antilynching bill does not deprive localities of an opportunity to preserve constitutional rights to their citizens. It merely arms the Federal Government with the right to step in and punish lynchers and cowardly officials when localities have failed.

The attitude of President Roosevelt toward this problem was indicated in his message to Congress on January 3. In his list of crimes that call on the strong arm of the Government for their immediate suppression and on the country for an aroused public opinion, the President cataloged lynching along with organized banditry, cold-blooded shooting, and kidnaping.

False local pride should not be allowed to kill the Wagner-Costigan bill.

S. 1978

A bill to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching

Be it enacted, etc., That the phrase "mob or riotous assemblage", when used in this act, shall mean an assemblage composed of three or more persons acting in concert, without authority of law, for the purpose of depriving any person of his life, or doing him physical injury.

SEC. 2. If any State or governmental subdivision thereof fails, neglects, or refuses to provide and maintain protection to the life or person of any individual within its jurisdiction against a mob or riotous assemblage, whether by way of preventing or punishing the acts thereof, such State shall by reason of such failure, neglect, or refusal be deemed to have denied to such person the equal protection of the laws of the State, and to the end that the protection guaranteed to persons within the jurisdictions of the several States, or to citizens of the United States, by the Constitution of the United States, may be secured, the provisions of this act are enacted.

SEC. 3. (a) Any officer or employee of any State or governmental subdivision who is charged with the duty or who possesses the power or authority as such officer or employee to protect the life or person of any individual injured or put to death by any mob or riotous assemblage or any officer or employee of any State or governmental subdivision having any such individual in his charge as a prisoner, who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all diligent efforts to protect such individual from being so injured or being put to death, or any officer or employee of any State or governmental subdivision charged with the duty of apprehending, keeping in custody, or prosecuting any person participating in such mob or riotous assemblage who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all diligent efforts to perform his duty in apprehending, keeping in custody, or prosecuting to final judgment under the laws of such State all persons so participating, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 5 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

(b) Any officer or employee of any State or governmental subdivision, acting as such officer or employee under authority of State law, having in his custody or control a prisoner, who shall conspire, combine, or confederate with any person to injure or put such prisoner to death without authority of law, or who shall conspire, combine, or confederate with any person to suffer such prisoner to be taken or obtained from his custody or control for the purpose of being injured or put to death without authority of law, shall be guilty of a felony, and those who so conspire, combine, or confederate with such officer or employee shall likewise be guilty of a felony. On conviction, the parties participating therein shall be punished by imprisonment of not less than 5 years or for life.

SEC. 4. The district court of the judicial district wherein the person is injured or put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall have jurisdiction to try and to punish, in accordance with the laws of the State where the injury is inflicted or the homicide is committed, any and all persons who participate therein: Provided, That it is first made to appear to such court (1) that the officers of the State charged with the duty of apprehending, prosecuting, and punishing such offenders under the laws of the State shall have failed, neglected, or refused to apprehend, prosecute, or punish such offenders; or (2) that the jurors obtainable for service in the State court having jurisdiction of the offense are so strongly opposed to such punishment that there is no probability that those guilty of the effense can be punished in such State court. A failure for more than 30 days after the commission of such an offense to apprehend or to indict the persons guilty thereof, or a failure diligently to prosecute such persons, shall be sufficient to constitute prima facie evidence of the failure, neglect, or refusal described in the above proviso.

SEC. 5. Any county in which a person is put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall forfeit $10,000, which sum may be recovered by suit therefor in the name of the United States against such county for the use of the family, if any, of the person so put to death; if he had no family, then of his dependent parents, if any; otherwise for the use of the United States. Such action shall be brought and prosecuted by the district attorney of the United States of the district in the United States district court for such district. If such forfeiture be not paid upon recovery of a judgment therefor, such court shall have jurisdiction to enforce payment thereof by levy of execution upon any property of the county, or may otherwise compel payment thereof by mandamus or other appropriate process; and any officer of such county or other person who disobeys or fails to comply with any lawful order of the court in the premises shall be liable to punishment as for contempt and to any other penalty provided by law therefor.

SEC. 6. In the event that any person so put to death shall have been transported by such mob or riotous assemblage from one county to another country during the time intervening between his seizure and putting to death, the county in which he is seized and the county in which he is put to death shall be jointly and severally liable to pay the forfeiture herein provided.

SEC. 7. Any act committed in any State or Territory of the United States in violation of the rights of a citizen or subject of a foreign country secured to such citizen or subject by treaty between the United States and such foreign country, which act constitutes a crime under the laws of such State or Territory, shall constitute a like crime against the peace and dignity of the United States, punishable in like manner in its courts as in the courts of said State or Territory, and within the period limited by the laws of such State or Territory, and may be prosecuted in the courts of the United States, and upon conviction the sentence executed in like manner as sentences upon convictions for crimes under the laws of the United States.

SEC. 8. If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada for the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway, signed July 18, 1932.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, it always has been my position that a United States Senator owes a dual allegiance, one to the State which he represents in the Senate, one to the United States as a whole.

Which is the higher allegiance it is not necessary for me to discuss nor even to consider in the matter of the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty. Because, to my mind, broad national interest and the long-time interest of the people of Kansas—in fact, of all the Middle Western and Western States whose products might in the future be handled through the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence route—this long-time local and sectional interest as well as the broad national interest swings the balance in favor of the St. Lawrence waterway project.

Therefore, I intend to vote to ratify the treaty. I also expect to vote for one or two of the reservations proposed by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. But my vote for the treaty itself does not depend upon the adoption of all or any of these reservations. I believe that the ultimate advantages to the Nation, and particularly to the people of Kansas and neighboring States, justify that vote, and I will cast my vote accordingly.

It is not my intention to detain the Senate today by entering into a long discussion of the details of the proposed treaty, nor of the points for and against its ratification. Others on the committee, and Senators not on the committee who have made a special study of this question, are better fitted for that task, and undoubtedly will undertake it.

But it does seem to me that there are several broad questions of general policy which should receive major consideration by every Senator in deciding how to vote on ratification of this treaty with our sister nation to the north. That decision should not be based upon what might be termed the depression psychology of today; nor upon whether or not the power possibilities in the treaty meet the approval or disapproval of great power interests; nor upon the local interests of certain cities which believe that commerce might be increased to the advantage of interior point cities.

Mr. President, I am not one of those who believe that the present continuing world-wide depression has permanently ended world trade and commerce. Neither do I believe that present conditions, brought about by war, by misunderstandings of the fundamentals of world trade and commerce, by unwise tariff barriers and unwise foreign-trade policies, by a monetary system and policy which has sacrificed foreign commerce, domestic trade, industry, agriculture, labor, and transportation to financial manipulations for the supposed benefit of those who deal in money—I cannot conceive and will not admit, Mr. President, that this great Nation is going to build a Chinese wall around its borders, and for all time shut itself off from commerce and intercourse with the rest of the world. Nor can I conceive, nor bring myself to admit, that the rest of the world is going to build for all time to come a Chinese wall against this Nation of ours, and shut us off from the rest of the world.

If I believed that were going to happen, if I could conceive of it as a remote probability, then I would be forced also to believe that the end of this civilization is at hand. I would say further that under such conditions, the quicker this civilization reached its end, and gave way to a new and more virile civilization, the better for mankind.

Mr. President, our generation faces a most difficult situation. Artificial trade barriers, international misunderstandings, national political and economic blunders, sectional jealousies, personal greeds and selfishness, plus ignorance of the fact that war destroys and does not build, have for the time being paralyzed trade and commerce, and have forced us for the time being to adopt measures and policies from necessity that, if adopted as permanent measures and policies, must bring more misery and suffering to the human race than it is possible for me to conceive of.

Under conditions as they exist in this country and throughout the world today, I will admit that it seems necessary, in the interest of self-preservation, for us in this country to curtail production to meet consumptive market demands.

I am going along with a program which calls for reduced production of wheat, of corn, of hogs, and cattle and dairy products—in fact, for reduced production of all the necessities and luxuries of life.

But I want to say, Mr. President, that to consider this as a permanent national policy, to make all our plans for the future of this Nation, for the future of the human race, on such a short-sighted policy would seem to me to amount to suicidal mania.

You cannot tell me, and make me believe it, that with millions of persons in this world suffering from hunger the way to improve this world and its peoples is to grow less wheat, less corn, less of all foodstuffs.

You cannot tell me, and make me believe it, that the way to human happiness is to deprive people of the necessities of life. What I am saying does not apply merely to foodstuffs. It applies to those things from which we make and provide clothing, shelter, communications, all the things that contribute to human welfare and well-being, that contribute to the pleasure and happiness and contentment and advancement of the human race.

Mr. President, the way to happiness for the people and prosperity for the Nation does not lie, in the long run, along the road of restriction, curtailment, destruction of things, and paralysis of trade.

The way to solve this so-called "overproduction", in the long run, is to attack the problems of distribution. We should adopt a long-time program which will call for more production of all the things that man desires and can use to his own advantage and better being.

Overproduction should be a blessing to mankind, not a curse, Mr. President.

It is not true overproduction that has brought us to our present sorry plight. In great part it is faulty distribution which says to the producer, "You have done such a good job that to punish you we will prevent others from using the good things you have produced."

We have so mismanaged the distribution of the wealth we have learned to produce that we say to those who have, "You cannot get rid of what you have except by becoming bankrupt." And we say to those who have not, "You cannot have any of those surpluses the producer has produced, except a meager portion handed you as one of a great world bread line."

Mr. President, the answer to this riddle we face today is not to cease production, but to start distribution. As a temporary economic expedient, I have accepted the program of the new deal calling for curtailment of production. But I want it understood I regard that as a temporary plan adopted to meet an emergency, not a permanent program to strangle future generations.

What I have just said, Mr. President, has an important bearing on the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty.

There are those who for various reasons, some of them sincere, some of them insincere, many of them fallacious and really economically unsound—there are those who have been telling the people of my section of this Nation, the great agricultural Middle West, that we never more will produce farm products for export to the rest of the world.

I refuse to believe that. I cannot believe that. I will not believe that. It is true we do not at present have a profitable market for our products, either at home or abroad. But that is due to dislocations in international relations, and even more to the misunderstanding that conceives of merchandising as a sale, instead of as an exchange of commodities and services.

Those dislocations, Mr. President, in time will be reduced, many of them removed. Then we will see commerce resumed, factories running full tilt, our people employed, our farmers producing foodstuffs and exchanging them for the products of the factories. Then will prosperity return, and with it, I hope, we will acquire those measures of value and human relationships which will enable us to use and enjoy that prosperity.

Now, Mr. President, anything that reduces the load of transportation costs upon commodities will in the long run inure to the benefit of those who produce, and of those who consume that which they produced.

Transportation is the bridge between producer and consumer. We build bridges for the benefit, primarily, of those who must use the bridge. The bridge itself is only the means to an end. And if two bridges across a stream will handle the traffic better, we build the two bridges—we may build one for express traffic, one for slow freight traffic.

To my mind, something like this is the deciding factor in regard to the St. Lawrence waterway.

It will reduce transportation costs between much of the Middle West and the Northwest, on the one hand, and the nations of Europe, at least, on the other.

We are going to trade again with Europe, Mr. President, if this civilization is to continue to exist. No other future seems possible to me.

Also this project should cheapen transportation costs between the Middle West and sections of the East. It will tend to promote the commerce in goods between these sections.

The farmers of the agricultural Middle West cannot prosper by consuming their own products alone. They must exchange those products for manufactured products. Otherwise the industrial centers will be smothered, buried alive, under the surplus of manufactured products. Just as the farmers will be smothered, buried alive, under their own surplus production.

Whatever facilitates the exchange of these commodities is economically sound, to revive an expression that has been more or less discarded in the last few years. Believing the St. Lawrence waterway will expedite and increase the flow of commerce, I am for the treaty.

There is another reason, Mr. President, why I believe Senators from the Middle Western States will render a service to their States and the people of their States by supporting this treaty.

There is another point to which I wish to call attention, and this, frankly, is from a sectional rather than a national viewpoint.

When the Panama Canal was thrown open to navigation, Mr. President, it moved the Atlantic coast closer to the Pacific coast in terms of trade and commerce. Measured on unit costs of transportation, San Francisco became only 1,680 cents removed from New York, where it had been 1,904 cents away.

But the Middle West, measured in transportation costs, was moved farther away from both New York and San Francisco. Chicago moved 336 cents farther away from the Pacific coast; it moved 504 cents farther away from the Atlantic seaboard and South America. The same applies to Kansas City, and to Kansas and and adjoining and nearby States.

It is my hope and my belief, Mr. President, that the construction of the St. Lawrence Waterway, through reducing freight costs on what we have to sell and what we have to buy, will tend to right that situation. Then all parts of the country will share in the lower transportation costs.

I am not going into the question of power. It is highly important to other sections of the country. I am willing they should have cheaper power, because resultant cheaper production costs, again, should facilitate exchange of goods inside this Nation. And that will be an aid to trade and commerce.

As a Senator of the United States, and as a Senator from Kansas, it seems plainly my duty to support the St. Lawrence waterway project, and I shall vote to ratify the treaty.

FINANCIAL TRANSACTIONS WITH DEFAULTING GOVERNMENTS

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask as in legislative session that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 682.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The motion would be first to proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that the Senator from California concedes the motion.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do. We have to go into legislative session first, I suppose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. That was the reason why I made the request as I did.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COSTIGAN in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, I ask that we proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider which was entered January 11, 1934, in relation to Senate bill 682.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. As the author of the bill, and the one responsible for its presentation to the Senate at the time it was presented, I consent, so far as I can, to the reconsideration of the action of the Senate in passing the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the votes whereby the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and passed will be reconsidered.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am not going to attempt to make any speech whatsoever upon this subject, save to recall to the Senate what now is before it.

The bill is Senate bill 682. It was introduced March 22, 1933. It was favorably reported to the Senate by the Judiciary Committee, by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], on April 6, 1933.

On January 8, 1934, I asked and was given permission to have the bill reprinted with certain amendments that then were contemplated.

On the 11th day of January 1934 the bill was passed regularly here upon the calling of the calendar. Subsequently the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] made the motion to reconsider which has just been granted.

Since that time I have been in consultation with the Senator from Arkansas and with the State Department and others who are interested in the bill, and since the time of the introduction of the measure, March 22, 1933, certain events have transpired in relation to the debts that are due to the United States from foreign governments that accentuate the necessity for the measure that is pending here.

The one great desideratum of the measure was that something should be done, even in small degree, concerning the defaults that had occurred in the debts due by other governments to the Government of the United States. The amendments that have been presented are amendments that have been written by those who thought the bill ought to be clarified and who thought, as well, that the measure should relate solely to governmental obligations—obligations due from other governments to the Government of our country.

In order that there may be immediate action if it be possible, and in order that the first desideratum of the bill may be accomplished, I have been very glad to consent—whether I was in whole-hearted accord with some of the amendment or not is immaterial—to the amendments thus presented by the different departments and the administration, and have this bill go upon record by vote of the Congress of the United States as the expression of the view of the Congress upon this subject.

So, Mr. President, I present the amendments that thus have been prepared by the various Departments, and ask that they be adopted.

We are now, I take it, at the stage of the bill at the time the amendments had been agreed to by the Senate just prior to its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator permit the Chair to state the parliamentary situation? The bill has been reconsidered.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And, without objection, the amendments will be reconsidered.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; if the President will pardon me, if you please, the amendments are agreed to, and there is no question upon those amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments about to be proposed do not include any amendments that have already been adopted?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certain amendments were adopted that appear in the bill as ultimately engrossed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And the Senator's proposed amendments do not interfere with those amendments?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir; they are entirely new.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the parliamentary status is as it should be.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, the Chair's suggestion in that particular is well worthy of consideration in connection with the amendment on line 7 of page 1 of the bill. The question is purely technical.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is one of the new amendments, if the Senator will pardon me. That is not an amendment that we adopted in the bill when it was passed. I was going to call off these amendments; and if the Senator will follow me, he will see that that is the case.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the Senator will see that the amendment in question really is a modification of one of the amendments heretofore agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. That may be true.

The first amendment that I suggest, and to which I have acceded, is, after the word "government", in line 7, page 1, to insert the words:

Or political subdivision thereof, or any organization or association acting for or on behalf of a government or political subdivision thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. In order that the clerk may have before him the amendments that have thus been suggested, I hand him a copy of the bill with the amendments inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there other amendments?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

The next amendment that has been suggested is, on page 2 of the bill, to strike out, in line 1, the two words "including any."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. The next one is, after the word "subdivision", in line 2, page 2, to insert:

Organization, or association, except a renewal or adjustment of existing indebtedness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. In line 2, page 2, strike out the word "or."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. The next amendment is, in line 3, page 2, after the word "division", to insert "organization or association."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. In line 4, after the word "Government", insert "of the United States."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. Beginning with the word "and", in line 4, page 2, strike out down to and including the designation "United States", in line 6, page 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. After line 11, page 2, insert the following:

Other than a public corporation created by or pursuant to special authorization of Congress, or a corporation in which the Government of the United States has or exercises a controlling interest, through stock ownership or otherwise.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. Those are the amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to a transposition of a sentence on page 1.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am unable to see that it makes any difference in the text, and I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that he present it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. I move to transpose the following language:

Within the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States—

So as to have it follow the word "unlawful" in line 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I say that in my judgment the amendment does not change the meaning and effect of the bill; but the suggestion has been made by a prominent attorney that it does involve a question of the substance, and, as I understand, it is in harmony with the purpose of the bill.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with what is sought to be accomplished by the provisions of this bill. I have not studied it up to this time. It occurred to me that undoubtedly the Senator from California has, and that he could inform me whether or not, in his opinion, this measure will in any way impinge upon the rights of nations with whom we have treaty relations. Those treaties, of course, are the supreme law of the land, and we are bound by their provisions. It occurred to me that possibly the Senator has studied that matter.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think I can answer the Senator that the bill will not have that effect; and I may say to him that it is the State Department itself that has prepared these amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter it shall be unlawful within the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States for any person to purchase or sell the bonds, securities, or other obligations of any foreign government or political subdivision thereof or any organization or association acting for or on behalf of a foreign government or political subdivision thereof, issued after the passage of this act, or to make any loan to such foreign government, political subdivision, organization, or association, except a renewal or adjustment of existing indebtedness while such government, political subdivision, organization, or association is in default in the payment of its obligations, or any part thereof, to the Government of the United States. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.

SEC. 2. As used in this act the term "person" includes individual, partnership, corporation, or association other than a public corporation created by or pursuant to special authorization of Congress, or a corporation in which the Government of the United States has or exercises a controlling interest through stock ownership or otherwise.

PRICE FIXING UNDER STEEL CODE—PRICE OF GASOLINE

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S.Res. 166) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and the same is hereby, directed to make an investigation and study of the steel code and report the result thereof to the Senate as soon as practicable, showing:

First, the practice of the steel industry under the code with reference to price fixing, the increase of price of steel products, and such other matters as would give a full presentation of facts touching the industry since it went under the N.R.A. code.

Second, that said Federal Trade Commission report to the Senate the increase in the price of gasoline during the last 6 months and what the increase of price means to the users of gasoline throughout the country in the way of additional cost.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Idaho to explain the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. The resolution calls for a report by the Federal Trade Commission, first, upon the steel code, as to whether or not, under the code, the steel industry has been engaged in price fixing. Secondly, it calls for a report as to the increase in the price of gasoline during the last 6 months.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

The resolution was considered by the Senate and agreed to.

CROP-PRODUCTION AND HARVESTING LOANS

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1975, the crop-production bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1975) to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1934, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment, on page 2, line 4, after the word "agency", to insert "or agencies", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration is authorized to make loans to farmers during the year 1934 of the same character and for the same purposes as the loans provided for by the act entitled "An act to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1933, and for other purposes", approved February 4, 1933. All loans made pusuant to this act shall be subject, so far as practicable, to the same terms and conditions (including penalties) as the loans made pursuant to such act of February 4, 1933.

SEC. 2. The Governor of the Farm Credit Administration is authorized and directed to establish an agency or agencies in each State with full authority to approve loans to persons in such State pursuant to this act and to make payments and take such action as may be necessary in connection with such loans. The Governor is further authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think the Senator from South Carolina should take the time to explain the amendments that are being made to the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, those interested in the pending bill had a meeting with the Governor of the Farm Credit Association, at which meeting certain amendments were agreed to. Those amendments will now be offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the first amendment I offer is on page 2, line 13, to strike out "$100,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$45,000,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 13, it is proposed to strike out "$100,000,000" and insert "$45,000,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I attended the conference held last Monday with Governor Myers and some of the others from the Farm Credit Administration, and heard the discussion referred to by the Senator from South Carolina. I protested at that time and stated that, in my opinion, $45,000,000 was not enough to take care of the feed and seed loans to be made this spring. It is true that in the 1933 loan only $57,000,000 was used, but in some of the hard spring wheat States—North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and a part of Minnesota, at least—the farmers are positive they will need more loans than they received or applied for a year ago. The language of the bill provides for the lending of the amount included in the bill or as much thereof as may be necessary. Last year there was $90,000,000 provided, out of which $57,000,000 was used, and the balance, of course, was returned to the Treasury as unexpended. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the amendment should provide a larger amount than the $45,000,000 proposed. I wish the Senator from Tennessee would substitute "$75,000,000" in place of "$45,000,000."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it will be impossible to do so for a number of reasons. It will be recalled that Dr. Myers, Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, stated that the most they could hope to secure at that time was $30,000,000. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has since seen the President and has made an arrangement whereby $45,000,000 will be satisfactory.

It seems to me, in view of the fact that the crop production bank will be put in operation and will thereby take at least a quarter of the loans, that $45,000,000 is tantamount to the $57,000,000 used last year. It is in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture to use more of the money or to have the money used or allotted as he sees fit. I have no doubt that the territory in the Northwest, to which the Senator from North Dakota refers, will be amply protected by the use of the $45,000,000, and I hope the Senator will not offer an amendment to the proposed amendment.

The Senator from North Dakota will recall that several days ago all the friends of this movement met together and the matter was thrashed out thoroughly by everybody. Governor Myer was present and was exceedingly agreeable about it; he wanted to carry out the proposal, was perfectly willing that it should be carried out, and, after everyone was heard, a compromise arrangement was entered into.

I hope the Senator from North Dakota will let the amendment be adopted as it was agreed upon at that time.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee further yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I feel quite sure in my own mind if the amendment carrying $45,000,000 shall be adopted that we will have to have a further appropriation later on in the session in order to take care of the situation, unless the money shall come from some other fund. The regional credit associations to which the Senator refers are for the purpose of making loans to farmers, but can only make loans to farmers who have adequate security. The farmers in the drought-stricken areas, who had no crops last year, and some of whom had very little of crops the previous year, have, as a result of that condition, coupled with the low prices, no purchasing power, no credit, and no security to offer at this time for a loan.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, my judgment is that we had better accept the figures that were agreed upon by the conference. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that I have the greatest consideration and sympathy for the situation that he has described in his section of the country, and I shall be glad to join him in any way I can to help arrange the matter.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to make a statement at this point?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. An effort is now being made, with great success up to the present time, for the Government to rent certain acreage from the producers of stable crops. It has been provided that the rental shall be paid half at planting time and half at gathering time, and in addition to the rental of the acreage there is to be an allotment according to the 5-year average. It is thought that such an arrangement will go largely toward aiding in financing the present crop. So it is my opinion that the amount now proposed will come nearer meeting the situation than the $57,000,000 flat did last year. It is estimated that there will be $125,000,000 distributed on the acreage rental plan. There will be an additional allotment, perhaps, amounting to $50,000,000 or $60,000,000. So the farmers of the country, in addition to the proposed $45,000,000, will have allocated to them something like $200,000,000 in the form of acreage rentals and allotments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina permit an interruption?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is it not a fact that the Farm Credit Administration estimated that a less sum than is carried in the proposed amendment, namely, $30,000,000 would be adequate for the purposes of this provision?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Tennessee to yield further.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I know that the allotment plan and the rental of acreage are helping somewhat, but in the drought-stricken sections the allotments the farmers are receiving for their wheat will to only a small extent assist them in getting groceries throughout the winter and that is all. In view, however, of what the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from South Carolina have said, I will not offer an amendment to the bill at this time, but I do want it distinctly understood, if the farmers of the drought-stricken territories and the spring-wheat territory shall need more money, that another bill will have to be introduced later on.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If it should develop that the proposed fund will not be sufficient to take care of the seed loans, and Congress should adjourn prior to the time of the spring planting—I do not know whether it will or not, but there are rumors that we may adjourn in April—does the Senator know of any other fund from which seed loans could be taken?

Mr. McKELLAR. I know of none, except from the crop production bank. There will be a crop production bank organized in every State of the Union.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It will require security, however, before the farmer may make a loan?

Mr. McKELLAR. It will require security satisfactory to the operators of that bank.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The trouble with that is that in many of the drought-stricken areas the farmers do not have any security.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator knows how much trouble we have had in getting as far as we have with this matter, and I hope that he will now not offer an amendment after the bill has been so thoroughly gone over.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I merely wanted the Senator to let us know if there will be any other fund available in case Congress shall not be in session at the time of the spring planting.

Mr. McKELLAR. None, except the crop production bank.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer another amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 4, beginning with the word "and", it is proposed to strike out through the word "State" in line 5, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

In his discretion to establish such agencies in any State as he may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer a further amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, after line 14, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 4. The interest on loans made by the Governor pursuant to this act shall be at a rate not to exceed 5½ percent per annum, and the amount charged to any borrower as a recording fee in connection with any such loan shall not exceed 50 cents. The amount which may be loaned to any borrower pursuant to this act shall not exceed $250, unless in the opinion of the Governor the circumstances surrounding the loan are such as to warrant a larger amount; but in no event shall any borrower be entitled to loan hereunder in excess of $400.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] will allow me, I desire to make a statement concerning that 50-cent recording fee.

Governor Myers stated that it was a tremendous expense to the Government to pay the recording fees, and he thought that the borrower should at least be required to pay a part thereof. He at first insisted that the borrower should pay it all, but some of us called his attention to the fact that it is all they can do to pay the loan with the last possible expense.

The point I desire to make, however, is that the Governor claimed that the Government paid the entire recording fee and that it amounted to perhaps $100,000 or more. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] was there and heard the Governor's statement that these recording-fee expenses were greater than the interest charged on the money. We agreed then that the borrower should not pay more than 50 cents flat as the recording fee.

Mr. McKELLAR. And, may I say, Mr. President, that is just half what it was proposed by the Governor they should pay.

Mr. SMITH. That is right.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. The question of recording fees has been a constant bone of contention in my State, and I know in other States, ever since the seed-loan policy was inaugurated, and in order to obviate any possible misunderstanding I hope that the Senator from Tennessee will agree to a modification of his amendment by adding in line 5, after the 50-cent limitation on the borrower, the following language:

And the remainder, if any, of any legal fees incurred in making such loans shall be paid by the Farm Credit Administration.

Mr. McKELLAR. I accept the amendment, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned. I see no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer a further amendment to carry out the same understanding and agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 9, it is proposed to strike out the word "all" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "except as hereinafter provided, all."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Are there further amendments to be proposed? If not, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The bill as passed is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration is authorized to make loans to farmers during the year 1934 of the same character and for the same purposes as the loans provided for by the act entitled "An act to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1933, and for other purposes", approved February 4, 1933. Except as hereinafter provided, all loans made pursuant to this act shall be subject, so far as practicable, to the same terms and conditions (including penalties) as the loans made pursuant to such act of February 4, 1933.

SEC. 2. The Governor of the Farm Credit Administration is authorized, in his discretion, to establish such agencies in any State as he may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, with full authority to approve loans to persons in such State pursuant to this act and to make payments and take such action as may be necessary in connection with such loans. The Governor is further authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury and not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $45,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. The interest on loans made by the Governor pursuant to this act shall be at a rate not to exceed 5½ percent per annum and the amount charged to any borrower as a recording fee in connection with any such loan shall not exceed 50 cents, and the remainder, if any, of any legal fees incurred in making said loan shall be paid by the Farm Credit Administration. The amount which may be loaned to any borrower pursuant to this act shall not exceed $250 unless, in the opinion of the Governor, the circumstances surrounding the loan are such as to warrant a larger amount; but in no event shall any borrower be entitled to a loan hereunder in excess of $400.

AMENDMENT TO INLAND WATERWAYS CORPORATION ACT

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business No. 258, being Senate bill 2347. It is a measure almost entirely of local concern and provides for an amendment to the Inland Waterways Corporation Act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2347) to amend the Inland Waterways Corporation Act, approved June 3, 1924, as amended, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision (e) of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to create the Inland Waterways Corporation for the purpose of carrying out the mandate and purpose of Congress as expressed in sections 201 and 500 of the transportation act, and for other purposes", approved June 3, 1924, as amended, is amended by striking out after the word "Warrior" the words "River or the Mississippi River", and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the words "Mississippi, Columbia, or Snake Rivers,".

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Idaho should explain the effect of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senate will recall that the Inland Waterways Corporation Act provides that anyone, including the Inland Waterways Corporation, engaged or about to engage in conducting a common-carrier service upon the Warrior River or the Mississippi River, or any tributaries thereof, may apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission for what is called a "public convenience or necessity permit", and the Interstate Commerce Commission, if it grants it, may then adjust the rates on the rivers in connection with the railroads, and so forth. The effect of this bill is simply to include the Columbia and Snake Rivers along with the Warrior River and the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is the bill for the purpose of giving these rivers the benefit of the law passed by Congress a few years ago in the matter of joint rates?

Mr. BORAH. The act was passed in 1926. I will read a portion of the act to the Senator:

Any person, firm, or corporation, including the Inland Waterways Corporation, engaged or about to engage in conducting a common-carrier service upon the Warrior River or the Mississippi River, or any tributaries thereof, may apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission and obtain a certificate of public convenience and necessity in accordance with the provisions of section 1 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, and the Interstate Commerce Commission shall thereupon, by order, direct all connecting common carriers and their connections to join with such water carrier in through routes and joint rates with reasonable rules, regulations, and practices—

And so forth.

This bill simply includes the Columbia and Snake Rivers in connection with the Warrior River and the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD in connection with the bill an editorial from the Lewiston (Idaho) Morning Tribune.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Lewiston Morning Tribune]

LINKING RAILWAYS WITH THE OPEN RIVER

Passage of the bill which was introduced in Congress this week by Senator BORAH, extending the rate provisions of the Inland Waterways Corporation Act to the Snake and Columbia Rivers, will be an essential step in assuring profitable use of the great Northwest waterway upon its completion. It also emphasizes a point which sometimes is overlooked in consideration of the project—that its benefits will go not alone to the communities situated along the rivers, but will extend to producers and shippers throughout the whole inland empire.

In ordering the railroads to establish joint rates with the Inland Waterways Corporation lines along the Mississippi River system, Congress stipulated that these rates should be made between points not materially more distant from each other by rail and water than by rail alone, the evident purpose being to prevent unnecessary movement and to restrict use of the waterways to economic limitations. In other words, when a shipment can reach its destination by rail and water at substantially the same mileage that it would have to travel by rail alone, or less, it would be entitled to the lower joint charges of carriage.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is required by law to adjust rates so that both rail and water transportation shall be fostered; to establish minimum rates on rail lines competing with water lines and to make these rates as much above those of water lines as cost of operation by rail is above that by water. The rates are not prescribed in the Commission's order; that is made the task of those to whom the order is issued. It has prescribed on the Mississippi that the joint rates shall be approximately 80 percent of the existing all-rail charges between the same points. It is likely that a similar basis would be adopted for the Columbia-Snake River Waterway.

While the general provisions of the act would apply to the local waterway, joint routes and rates could not become operative until a full hearing was held by the Interstate Commerce Commission, with intricate legal procedure, appeals, and other complications which could long delay securing the benefits of the cheaper carriage by water. What Senator Borah's bill asks is that this "red tape" be clipped and that joint rail and water rates be automatically established upon opening of the Snake-Columbia Waterway, as has been done on the Mississippi, subject, of course, to revision upon protest of the railways, but in effect during the period of litigation. As Capt. Arthur Ward pointed out in submitting the request on behalf of the local open-river interests, "Inasmuch as we are asking for equal treatment and in no sense are proposing a new precedent, we see no reason why prompt and favorable action should not be had in this instance."

And what about the railroads and their relationship to the waterway in its general phases? That is a point about which there has been much misunderstanding and specious reasoning.

The past antagonism of the railways to any competitive river development, open and underhanded, is a rather unpleasant matter of record. There are some who have harbored honest doubts regarding the claim sometimes advanced that restoring boats on the river would ruin the rail carriers. If this were true, if establishment of waterway service would merely milk the railroads while helping the inland empire to a degree, the entire project would be a disappointment.

Available facts and experience elsewhere, however, do not indicate any such conclusions. The tragic truth is that agriculture and industry in this vast empire are perishing slowly under the burden of high rail rates which permit no margin of profit, and the railways profess that these rates are as low as operation costs will permit. These conditions would indicate that both the producers and the railways are going down into bankruptcy together and that the carriers can offer no hope of relief. Surely, then, they can have no reasonable objection to any development which will bring back even a degree of prosperity to the region they serve, and which they will continue to serve after the rivers are opened.

The experience with waterways in the Middle West and elsewhere has been that both the river and rail carriers have shared the beneficial effects. River transportation under any circumstances cannot compete with the new development of fast rail transportation of class freight. The rivers cannot cut in on the railroads' passenger business. But the rivers can, jointly with the railroads, make it possible to move bulk freight at lower rates and therefore in greater quantities. The rivers can bring back an income to the people which will make it possible for them to purchase those manufactured and other products which the railroads alone can carry. The rivers, when properly used, can strengthen the whole economic and industrial structure of the Northwest States. The flow of goods as well as the flow of produce can be stimulated and resources which are dependent on cheap transportation can be developed. As business multiplies and the interior prospers, the railroads will prosper also and be able to give better service in their field.

Lewiston, in its long battle to secure river transportation, has no quarrel with the railroads. Its only concern is whether this great region shall live and prosper or decline into decay. The railroads cannot afford to take the same obstructive stand toward this proposal that they have taken in the past. The railroads are not going to be destroyed when this project goes through. They can, if they cooperate, make the inevitable development of great advantage to themselves in the long run.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Idaho, and following his remarks, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a message sent to the Congress of the United States by President Theodore Roosevelt on the question of inland waterways.

The discussion on the St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty having had so much to do with transportation on water, I think this message of President Theodore Roosevelt, dated February 26, 1908, transmitting to the Congress the preliminary report of the Inland Waterways Commission, previously appointed by President Roosevelt, will be of interest, and I ask that the message may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the message was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[S. Doc. No. 325, 60th Cong., 1st sess.]

PRELIMINARY REPORT OF THE INLAND WATERWAYS COMMISSION

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a preliminary report from the Inland Water-Ways Commission, which was appointed by me last March in response to a widespread interest and demand from the people. The basis of this demand lay in the general and admitted inability of the railroads to handle promptly the traffic of the country, and especially the crops of the previous fall.

This report is well worth your attention. It is thorough, conservative, sane, and just. It represents the mature judgment of a body of men exceptionally qualified, by personal experience and knowledge of conditions throughout the United States, to understand and discuss the great problem of how best to use our waterways in the interest of all the people. Unusual care has been taken to secure accuracy and balance of statement. If the report errs at all, it is by overconservatism. It contains findings or statements of fact, a number of specific recommendations, and an account of inquiries still in progress, and it is based in part on statistics and other information contained in a voluminous appendix. The subject with which it deals is of critical importance both to the present and the future of our country.

Our river systems are better adapted to the needs of the people than those of any other country. In extent, distribution, navigability, and ease of use they stand first. Yet the rivers of no other civilized country are so poorly developed, so little used, or play so small a part in the industrial life of the Nation as those of the United States. In view of the use made of rivers elsewhere, the failure to use our own is astonishing, and no thoughtful man can believe that it will last. The accompanying report indicates clearly the reasons for it and the way to end it.

The Commission finds that it was unregulated railroad competition which prevented or destroyed the development of commerce on our inland waterways. The Mississippi, our greatest natural highway, is a case in point. At one time the traffic upon it was without a rival in any country. The report shows that commerce was driven from the Mississippi by the railroads. While production was limited, the railways, with their convenient terminals, gave quicker and more satisfactory service than the waterways. Later they prevented the restoration of river traffic by keeping down their rates along the rivers, recouping themselves by higher charges elsewhere. They also acquired water fronts and terminals to an extent which made water competition impossible. Throughout the country the railways have secured such control of canals and steamboat lines that today inland waterway transportation is largely in their hands. This was natural and doubtless inevitable under the circumstances, but it should not be allowed to continue unless under careful Government regulation.

Comparatively little inland freight is carried by boat which is not carried a part of its journey by rail also. As the report shows, the successful development and use of our interstate waterways will require intelligent regulation of the relations between rail and water traffic. When this is done the railways and waterways will assist instead of injuring each other. Both will benefit, but the chief benefit will accrue to the people in general through quicker and cheaper transportation.

The report rests throughout on the fundamental conception that every waterway should be made to serve the people as largely and in as many different ways as possible. It is poor business to develop a river for navigation in such a way as to prevent its use for power, when by a little foresight it could be made to serve both purposes. We cannot afford needlessly to sacrifice power to irrigation, or irrigation to domestic water supply, when by taking thought we may have all three. Every stream should be used to the utmost. No stream can be so used unless such use is planned for in advance. When such plans are made we shall find that, instead of interfering, one use can often be made to assist another. Each river system, from its headwaters in the forest to its mouth on the coast, is a single unit and should be treated as such. Navigation of the lower reaches of a stream cannot be fully developed without the control of floods and low waters by storage and drainage. Navigable channels are directly concerned with the protection of source waters and with soil erosion, which takes the materials for bars and shoals from the richest portions of our farms. The uses of a stream for domestic and municipal water supply, for power, and in many cases for irrigation, must also be taken into full account.

The development of our inland waterways will have results far beyond the immediate gain to commerce. Deep channels along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts and from the Gulf to the Great Lakes will have high value for the national defense. The use of water power will measurably relieve the drain upon our diminishing supplies of coal, and transportation by water instead of rail only will tend to conserve our iron. Forest protection, without which river improvement cannot be permanent, will at the same time help to postpone the threatened timber famine, and will secure us against a total dearth of timber by providing for the perpetuation of the remaining woodlands. Irrigation will create the means of livelihood for millions of people, and supplies of pure water will powerfully promote the public health. If the policy of waterway improvement here recommended is carried out, it will affect for good every citizen of the Republic. The National Government must play the leading part in securing the largest possible use of our waterways; other agencies can assist and should assist, but the work is essentially national in its scope.

The various uses of waterways are now dealt with by bureaus scattered through four Federal departments. At present, therefore, it is not possible to deal with a river system as a single problem. But the Commission here recommends a policy under which all the commercial and industrial uses of the waterways may be developed at the same time. To that end, Congress should provide some administrative machinery for coordinating the work of the various departments so far as it relates to waterways. Otherwise there will not only be delay, but the people as a whole will fail to get from our streams the benefits to which they are justly entitled.

The Commission recognizes that the cost of improving our inland waterways will be large, but far less than would be required to relieve the congestion of traffic by railway extension. The benefits of such improvement will be large also, and they will touch the daily life of our people at every point, uniting the interests of all the States and sections of our country. The cost and the benefits should be equitably distributed, by cooperation with the States and the communities, corporations, and individuals beneficially affected. I heartily concur in the Commission's recommendation to this end. Such cooperation should result in united effort in carrying out the great duty of improving our inland waterways. While we delay our rivers remain unused, our traffic is periodically congested, and the material wealth and natural resources of the country related to waterways are being steadily absorbed by great monopolies.

Among these monopolies, as the report of the Commission points out, there is no other which threatens, or has ever threatened, such intolerable interference with the daily life of the people as the consolidation of companies controlling water power. I call your special attention to the attempt of the power corporations, through bills introduced at the present session, to escape from the possibility of Government regulation in the interests of the people. These bills are intended to enable the corporations to take possession in perpetuity of national forest lands for the purposes of their business, where and as they please, wholly without compensation to the public. Yet the effect of granting such privileges, taken together with rights already acquired under State laws, would be to give away properties of enormous value. Through lack of foresight we have formed the habit of granting without compensation extremely valuable rights amounting to monopolies on navigable streams and on the public domain. The repurchase at great expense of water rights thus carelessly given away without return has already begun in the East, and before long will be necessary in the West also. No rights involving water power should be granted to any corporations in perpetuity, but only for a length of time sufficient to allow them to conduct their business profitably. A reasonable charge should of course be made for valuable rights and privileges which they obtain from the National Government. The values for which this charge is made will ultimately, through the natural growth and orderly development of our population and industries, reach enormous amounts. A fair share of the increase should be safeguarded for the benefit of the people, from whose labor it springs. The proceeds thus secured, after the cost of administration and improvement has been met, should naturally be devoted to the development of our inland waterways.

The report justly calls attention to the fact that hitherto our national policy has been one of almost unrestricted disposition and waste of natural resources, and emphasizes the fundamental necessity for conserving these resources upon which our present and future success as a Nation primarily rests. Running water is a most valuable natural asset of the people, and there is urgent need for conserving it for navigation, for power, for irrigation, and for domestic and municipal supply.

The Commission was appointed to obtain information concerning our waterways as related to the general welfare. Much work was done, but more remains to be done before a plan for their development can be prepared in detail. We need additional information on the flow of our streams, the condition of channels, the amount and cost of water traffic, the requirements for terminals, the area in each watershed which should be kept under forest, and the means of preventing soil waste and the consequent damage to our rivers. But it is neither necessary nor desirable to postpone the beginning of the work until all the facts are obtained. We have suffered heavily in the past from the lack of adequate transportation facilities, and unless a beginning is made promptly we shall suffer still more heavily in the future.

Being without funds or an expert staff, the Commission has confined itself to principles affecting the whole problem and the entire country. Its report is a plea, in the light of actual facts, for simplicity and directness in dealing with the great problem of our inland waterways in the interest of the people. It submits no specific plans or recommendations concerning even the most important projects. The first of these of course concerns the Mississippi and its tributaries, whose commercial development will directly affect half our people. The Mississippi should be made a loop of the sea and work upon it should be begun at the earliest possible moment. Only less important is the Atlantic inner passage, parts of which are already under way. The inner passages along the Gulf coast should be extended and connected with the Atlantic waters. The need for the developing of the Pacific coast rivers is not less pressing. Our people are united in support of the immediate adoption of a progressive policy of inland waterway development.

Hitherto our national policy of inland waterway development has been largely negative. No single agency has been responsible under the Congress for making the best use of our rivers, or for exercising foresight in their development. In the absence of a comprehensive plan, the only safe policy was one of repression and procrastination. Frequent changes of plan and piecemeal execution of projects have still further hampered improvement. A channel is no deeper than its shallowest reach, and to improve a river short of the point of effective navigability is a sheer waste of all it costs. In spite of large appropriations for their improvement, our rivers are less serviceable for interstate commerce today than they were half a century ago and in spite of the vast increase in our population and commerce they are on the whole less used.

The first condition of successful development of our waterways is a definite and progressive policy. The second is a concrete general plan, prepared by the best experts available, covering every use to which our streams can be put. We shall not succeed until the responsibility for administering the policy and executing and extending the plan is definitely laid on one man or group of men who can be held accountable. Every portion of the general plan should consider and, so far as practicable, secure to the people the use of water for power, irrigation, and domestic supply as well as for navigation. No project should be begun until the funds necessary to complete it promptly are provided, and no plan once under way should be changed except for grave reasons. Work once begun should be prosecuted steadily and vigorously to completion. We must make sure that projects are not undertaken except for sound business reasons, and that the best modern business methods are applied in executing them. The decision to undertake any project should rest on actual need, ascertained by investigation and judgment of experts and on its relation to great river systems or to the general plan, and never on mere clamor.

The improvement of our inland waterways can and should be made to pay for itself so far as practicable from the incidental proceeds from water power and other uses. Navigation should, of course, be free. But the greatest return will come from the increased commerce, growth, and prosperity of our people. For this we have already waited too long. Adequate funds should be provided, by bond issue, if necessary, and the work should be delayed no longer. The development of our waterways and the conservation of our forests are the two most pressing physical needs of the country. They are interdependent, and they should be met vigorously, together, and at once. The questions of organization, powers, and appropriations are now before the Congress. There is urgent need for prompt and decisive action.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 26, 1908.

LIMITATION OF JURISDICTION OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 140, being Senate bill 752.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator indicate the character of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the bill is one limiting the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in the matter of public utility rate fixing. I can state in a sentence the purpose of the bill.

Mr. KING. I am familiar with it. I did not know that was the bill for which the Senator desired consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the bill shall be taken up I intend to call for a quorum, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] desires to be heard upon the subject.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does the Senator from California intend to have a vote on the bill today? A number of us would like to be present, and I am compelled to be absent for a couple of hours, my absence being imperative on account of a prior engagement in connection with public matters. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill if a vote is not had today.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will say that I took this opportunity because the business of the Senate is practically at an impasse for the moment, and I thought that we might utilize the time upon a bill which is of very extraordinary importance to every State that has a public-service commission and that endeavors to regulate the public utilities within its borders.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill. The only question I had in mind, a number of Senators being absent in committees and otherwise, was whether the Senator wanted a vote on the bill this afternoon or when we finish its consideration today take a further moment on Monday to act upon it. I have no objection to its consideration at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, some days ago the Senator from California suggested to me that he should like at an opportune time to proceed to the consideration of this bill. I looked into the subject matter of the bill, read the report on it, and advised him that I thought probably today would be an opportune time to take it up. The Senator stated to me that he had no disposition to hasten unduly action on the bill; that it had been here for a long time and had been reported upon over and over again by the Judiciary Committee; and that he would like to secure action on it during the present session. I reaffirm the statement already made to him that I thought perhaps today would be an opportune time to take up the bill.

A great many Senators have approached me regarding a recess over tomorrow, and I have in mind when the Senate concludes its labors today moving a recess until Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON. I may suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that I will be perfectly willing if there is any disposition to postpone this bill until Monday to take it up on Monday afternoon, if we may do so.

Mr. KING. Let the bill be debated today, and let a vote be taken on Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am very anxious to accommodate every Senator in relation to the measure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. My suggestion is that we proceed with the consideration of the bill, and, then, if it appears that there is necessity for deferring action on it, that we adopt the course now suggested by the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LOGAN in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 752) to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended, with respect to the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States over suits relating to orders of State administrative boards.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Now, Mr. President, I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Before the Senator does that, may I say to the Senator that I am going to speak to this motion in respect to a phase of the St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty problem? No quorum is necessary for that purpose, and perhaps I may proceed ahead of the call for a quorum.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the leader of the majority, the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], if there has been reached such an understanding, as yesterday we understood was to be taken up, concerning a vote on the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty, as there are a number of Senators who desire to speak, and I should like to be able to let them know when they may proceed?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, Mr. President; a request was made yesterday for a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the treaty, but that request was objected to. There has as yet been no unanimous-consent agreement entered into.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, on that point I should like to say to the Senator from Illinois that I trust he will remain in the Chamber, and I hope that, before the day is over, we may yet agree upon a time to vote, for I share his anxiety in that respect.

Mr. President, on yesterday I submitted to the Senate a very large number of petitions, which were placed in my hands from citizens of Michigan who are in opposition to the pending St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty. I undertook to make it perfectly plain, in connection with that presentation, that I wanted to be completely fair in giving this Michigan minority its full opportunity to register its full opposition and I had the full petition printed in yesterday's RECORD. But I stated, Mr. President, that I wanted, at a subsequent time, to analyze the basis of this action which has been taken by the thousands of citizens who have signed these petitions and the nature of the textual appeal which won their signatures, and that is what I now propose to do. I do it with the greatest respect for the attitudes of these 108,000 men and women who have signed these individual petitions; and for the purpose of assuring them that I would not stand in opposition to their views except for a deep-seated and profound conviction that they are mistaken in their facts.

This great number of petitions have been procured through the activity of a highly organized and aggressive association known as the Michigan Railroad Employees and Citizens' League. May I say that if I thought the facts respecting the seaway situation were as set forth in the text of the petition which these constituents of mine have signed in such great numbers, I should most cordially agree with their conclusions. But, Mr. President, I think, upon the other hand, if I were to write a petition setting forth the facts as I understand them to be and as they are certified by all the official information before the Senate, these same citizens who in such large numbers have signed this particular petition would just as cheerfully and enthusiastically agree with me that the treaty should be ratified. It all depends upon understanding of the facts.

Naturally, it is not a pleasant thing to be in disagreement with a large group of one's constituents. But I am profoundly of the opinion that these good men and women have signed the petitions under a misapprehension respecting the facts. I am profoundly of the opinion that many of the familiar misconceptions which have been exploded here upon the floor of the Senate under the whip and pressure of debate are the precise misconceptions which have unwittingly led to the erroneous conclusions that are contained in these petitions.

I want to make it perfectly plain that I do not criticize the motives in any degree of those who have undertaken this highly organized campaign in my State against the seaway treaty. I am perfectly sure that the men and women who have signed these petitions have done so in absolute good faith. I accept their expressions in this spirit, and I am confident they will accept my rejoinder in the same spirit. We all want to arrive at the wisest decision for both Michigan and the Republic. I beg of them, and of the Senate, to hear me in open-minded judgment.

Inasmuch as I must continue my disagreement with these petitioners, the thing I must point out is that the premise upon which the signatures are obtained is a premise which, in my humble judgment, has no foundation in fact. That is the controlling thesis to which I address myself.

The first sentence in these petitions reads as follows:

The waterway is not needed.

Mr. President, this statement is directly contrary to the findings in the official economic surveys made by the International Joint Commission in 1920, and I refer to Document No. 114 of the Sixty-seventh Congress, second session. It is equally contrary to the United States Department of Commerce study published as Senate Document No. 183, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session. It is also directly contrary to the findings submitted to the Senate by the President of the United States contemporaneously and sustained by him through down-to-date proof collected by his interdepartment surveyors who have canvassed the whole problem anew within the last 6 months, and in the light of the latest available information.

To say that the waterway is not needed seems to me runs squarely counter to the officially demonstrated fact. I do not intend to thresh old straw. I do not intend to cover the argument which has been submitted time and time again to the Senate. I want simply to call the attention of these people—and they live not only in my State but throughout the Union, people who are reading hostile propaganda and depending upon it as a basis for their opinion—I want to call their attention to a contrary state of facts which, if true, would cause them to endorse this project, just as now, under a set of adverse facts, they proceed to criticize it.

They say the waterway is not needed. Just contemplate the physical facts involved. If there were a great highway across this country 1,500 miles long developed superbly at both ends for hundreds and hundreds of miles, and if the utility of that great highway was impaired and rendered relatively impotent by a single 40-mile section in the heart of it which was relatively impassable, would any sane man say that it was not necessary and advisable and desirable to develop that intervening 40-mile link so as to get the full advantage of the 1,500-mile highway?

I submit as an axiom that any such construction would proceed as a matter of elementary necessity and common sense. This analogy exists absolutely in respect to the St. Lawrence project. It is the precise St. Lawrence status in terms of a water highway.

Here is this great waterway already substantially built, built first by God himself, developed subsequently by the engineering genius of mankind. Here is a waterway already built at both ends and needing only this central link to complete the utility of the whole great undertaking.

"The waterway is not needed"? Mr. President, it is needed on the sheer basis of the physical aspect and challenge of the situation.

Certainly no one in the midcontinent should say that we of Michigan and the midcontinent do not need relief from the differential that runs against us in freight rates as the result of the existence of the Panama Canal. Ever since the Panama Canal was completed—and we of the Middle West cheerfully contributed our share of its cost without any respect as to whether we would be beneficiaries or not—the great midcontinent has been under a handicap as respects competition with the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards. I state unequivocally and without reservation that the waterway is needed in order to overcome this differential. It is particularly needed for this purpose by such States as Michigan.

Nor is that all. This great midcontinent has been at a handicap in reaching its own domestic markets along its own Atlantic seaboard. I assert that the waterway is needed in order to connect our current agriculture in our section of the United States with the great markets along the Atlantic seaboard, and they can be effectively reached in no other fashion.

I say that we are under an export handicap which no man who studies the facts can deny. My State of Michigan is the fourth largest exporting State in the Union in spite of the fact that it is a thousand miles from any sea. The men who have been able to build up an export trade of that magnitude under such handicaps are entitled to be listened to as expert witnesses. It is those men who have made the State of Michigan the fourth largest exporter in the Union despite this handicap. It is those men who say to us that the continued assurance of our existing export trade and the hope and promise of its perpetuation and expansion are served fundamentally and primarily by deep-sea water connections at the docks of the city of Detroit and related ports. They do not guess about this matter. They submit authenticated data.

The waterway is not needed? The waterway is needed under every theory of reason, speaking generally; and, from a Michigan standpoint, it is needed a little more than any other single governmental undertaking of which I know. It is my sincere belief that it will stimulate a new and accentuated industrial activity in Michigan and the other Midwestern manufacturing States, which will contribute to sustained prosperity for this whole section. The waterway is needed because it personifies our belated birthright.

Let me proceed with the reasons which have actuated these good citizens, these fine constituents of mine, in asking me to vote against the treaty. What is the next reason?—

We have currently a Lakes-to-the-sea waterway and other wholly efficient transportation facilities.

Mr. President, what is this Lakes-to-the-sea waterway which we currently possess? If we are considering the St. Lawrence outlet, the present facility which we possess is limited to a 14-foot channel in the great international section of the St. Lawrence River. Our commerce is developing amazingly in spite of this handicap. I freely concede that it is developing. Indeed, that gives substance to our hopes for the future. If it develops in the face of such a handicap which virtually requires this interoceanic trade to be confined to the casual tramp steamer of less than 14 feet draft; if we develop under that handicap, what is calculated to be the development when 80 percent of the cargo ships on all the oceans of the world can enter the Great Lakes at tidewater? Despite existing handicaps we already have on the Great Lakes 35 percent of all the water-borne commerce traveling under the American flag. What would we have without the handicap?

If we are figuring upon existing facilities via the Erie Canal and down to the harbor of New York, I submit that the facility is not even to be mentioned in a seaway argument. That canal is a barge canal. The use of that canal requires transshipment of cargo, requires breaking of cargo, requires the double cost of two reloadings. There is nothing whatever in the barge canal to be mentioned in the same calculation with a seaway undertaking such as that we now address ourselves to. It is utterly remote from these calculations.

Let us see what is the next reason which has moved these citizens of Michigan, and a great number of them, to subscribe themselves to this protest:

We cannot afford it. The woeful condition of public finances and our already grievous tax burdens warrant no such vast expenditure.

Mr. President, when we inquire whether or not we can afford this undertaking, the first necessity is to find out what it is we are asked to afford. If we are asking these people whether we can afford to spend $1,500,000,000 upon this project, that is one thing, and a prejudicial and unwarranted form of inquiry. If we are asking them whether we can afford to spend $9,000,000 a year upon it, that is a totally different thing. What facts have been presented upon the countryside to make men and women believe that we cannot afford this undertaking? I will tell you what some of the facts are. I have literally a basketful of this propaganda, and I am not speaking of the propaganda from this Michigan league alone. I am speaking of propaganda from all the various sections of the country which have entrenched in an embattled purpose to prevent the approval of the treaty, usually from motives of sectional selfishness.

What is it that has caused this feeling of fear of expense? It is just such a story as the one that we have heard time and time again that Col. Hugh Cooper, the great international engineer, says it is going to cost $1,500,000,000 to do this job, when Colonel Cooper himself notifies the Senate of the United States that when he was talking about a $1,500,000,000 project, he was talking about a totally different project than that which impends.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator has mentioned what he calls the "Michigan League". I should like to know what that means. What kind of a league is it? Is it a taxpayers' league?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am unable to identify the Michigan League in detail. It is operated in perfectly good faith,

I am confident, chiefly, I believe, by representatives of the railroad brotherhoods. Nor do I blame them for demanding searching scrutiny of any allegedly competitive transportation facility. Gathered with them undoubtedly are men and women who were interested in railroad securities, and I do not complain of their tender vigilance. They need to protect themselves. Gathered further with them are men and women, no doubt, who have a genuine belief that we should cease to subsidize with Government money the competition which is afforded the railroads in respect to the traffic of the country. There is much to be said abstractly for that attitude. Undoubtedly there are many different groups similarly minded.

As I said in the beginning, I have no interest in probing for any underlying sinister motive in respect to this matter. I am perfectly willing to take this petition in good faith upon its face. I am simply undertaking to demonstrate that the facts upon which these good citizens are asked to assign themselves in hostility to the treaty are facts which cannot be sustained as facts. I am simply undertaking to demonstrate my profound belief that these earnest petitioners are misguided unwittingly.

Mr. LEWIS rose.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator from Illinois desire to interrupt me?

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator will be kind enough to yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. It is no purpose of mine to allude at all to those petitions or signers as to whom the Senator is speaking. As to the subject dwelt on by him I have no knowledge. But I ask the Senator now to consider this telegram he produced relating to what he regards as the confession of mistaken estimate of Colonel Cooper, as engineer, testifying as to cost of power. The able Senator from Michigan says he thinks it is that mistake of figures that forms the basis of this protest he is receiving. The other day the Senator from Michigan, the competent Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who has been so alert, claimed, if I am not mistaken, that the cost of power is $80 per horsepower. Therefore, I ask the Senator from Michigan if Colonel Cooper in his telegram claims that the $1,350,000,000 was intended to cover the development of 5,000,000 horsepower and not the 2,000,000 in the intersection. Still I ask the Senator from Michigan if he will not now see that even if Colonel Cooper's estimate shall be said to refer but to the 2,000,000, America must pay over $1,000,000,000 for power in this treaty.

We illustrate. Take the 3,000,000 horsepower to be developed entirely on the Canadian side, and say it is done at Canadian expense. Since the cost is $80 a horsepower, that would mean that Canada develops 3,000,000 horsepower of the 5,000,000, or $240,000,000. Subtract that from the estimate of $1,350,000,000, which my able friend from Michigan insists was based on 5,000,000 horsepower. Still we have an estimate of Colonel Cooper for 2,000,000 on the basis of the $80 conceded by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE]. Measure that by the 2,000,000 horsepower that the Senator says is the only amount to be considered in intersection. Then we still have, upon Colonel Cooper's basis and the construction of my able friend from Michigan, $1,110,000,000 from America, under the name of power, to be paid for by the United States under this treaty obligation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. LEWIS. I have concluded. I bring these figures to the attention of the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I find the calculations of my able friend most interesting. I submit, however, that neither a colloquy between the Senator from Washington and the junior Senator from Michigan nor a colloquy between the Senator from Illinois and the junior Senator from Michigan can undertake to arrive at a dependable engineering estimate.

I know nothing about the unit costs of engineering. I suspect that my able friend from Illinois knows no more about them than I do.

Mr. LEWIS. This is power, may I say to my friend.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am speaking about the unit cost of power or the unit cost of anything else.

Mr. LEWIS. I am referring to Colonel Cooper's testimony, as shown by the telegram to my able friend, which he has read to the Senate as explaining Colonel Cooper's position.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am dealing solely with the fundamental fact that the opponents of this treaty have repeatedly quoted the total estimate from Colonel Cooper at a figure which, no matter how much higher, nevertheless is confessedly higher than it would have been if the estimate had been made upon the project which we are considering; and that is the point I am submitting. Colonel Cooper estimated a project involving three times as much power development as the pending St. Lawrence project.

The same thing has been true in respect to information regarding the Panama Canal.

What were these people out upon the countryside told respecting our experience with the Panama Canal and its cost? They were often told that the estimates of the rivers and harbors engineers, the engineers of the War Department, were utterly unreliable; that they demonstrated, in the case of the Panama Canal, that they could not be trusted in respect to the figures that they make regarding the St. Lawrence adventure. Yet what is the cold, hard, indisputable fact when we get down into the record which no man can deny? The fact is that the estimate of the engineers upon the complete project was $3,000,000 more than it cost to build the Panama Canal.

In other words, in the greatest single undertaking comparable with that which we now have at the bar of the Senate, with the greatest single engineering responsibility in the history of the New World, the same engineers who are now claimed to be so utterly unreliable in this propaganda that circulates the countryside came within $3,000,000 of estimating the final completed construction cost of the $375,000,000 Panama Canal, and that $3,000,000 was on the safe side. Do they or do they not deserve our confidence when they figure the St. Lawrence project?

I repeat, going back to the language of the petition to which I am addressing myself, it is impossible to say whether we can afford this undertaking until it is first demonstrated what price it is that we are asked whether we can afford.

Certainly if we ask these good people whether we can afford a billion and a half dollars, the answer is calculated to be "No." But suppose we ask them this, which is the truth, Mr. President, suppose we point out to them that our half of this verified and dependable estimate is $272,000,000, and then suppose we point out to them that we have an offset of $90,000,000 from New York State by way of reimbursement for power, and then suppose we point out to them that we have a further offset of twenty or thirty million dollars for existing works for which we already have paid in the connected chain that represents this completed seaway. Then what is the net result? Then the net result is that we are talking about a project in terms of United States expenditure, not of a billion and a half dollars, but of about $150,000,000. And then, when we go into the plans that are officially submitted to us for the handling of this enterprise, we find a document upon the bar of the Senate, under the responsibility of the President of the United States, which says that this whole undertaking shall be amortized under a plan which, counting maintenance, amortization, principal and interest of debt, everything, will cost $9,000,000 a year on the contemplated long-range basis.

Mr. President, let these good men and women confront that question. Can we afford $9,000,000 a year to unlock the Midwest and give it the advantage of interoceanic connections with all the ports of the world? Can we afford $9,000,000 a year? I submit that every man and woman who has signed one of these petitions to me would just as quickly sign a petition saying that we can afford $9,000,000 a year for a purpose of that character.

I interpolate another consideration. It is stated to us in plain language by the President that Canada can build an all-Canadian seaway of her own if we decline this partnership affair. It is a fact. I beg of the treaty's opponents to look that fact in the eye. Can we afford to let our great international neighbor thus monopolize a midcontinental route to the markets of the world? Can we afford to precipitate a situation in which our industries must move across the line in order to take advantage of this prime facility? Can we afford to give competitive Canadian agriculture this severe advantage over American agriculture? Can we afford in such an event the probable denial of our navigation privileges in the all-Canadian Welland Canal, which our neighbor has constructed at a cost of $130,000,000, all Canadian dollars? When we face this alternative, I submit that we cannot afford not to proceed upon a common enterprise as projected in the pending treaty.

I could understand why Atlantic-seaboard ports might think they cannot afford to let our midwestern ports control their own export and import trade, why they might want to continue to take tolls of our trade. I could understand it, although I should regret any such provincial attitude after we have paid our full and uncomplaining share of the cost to develop these Atlantic ports. But for the life of me I cannot understand why anybody in the Midwest, and least of all in Michigan, should suggest that we cannot afford to accept this priceless boon.

Now, let us see: What is the next reason assigned to their opposition by these petitioners? While I am speaking primarily to them, the argument addresses itself to the whole Senate opposition.

The next reason is that the seaway will divert traffic from the adequately equipped railroads, thereby increasing their insolvency and otherwise destroying the vested rights of American citizens.

I may say to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] parenthetically that, having stumbled on the words "vested rights" in this language, he may for himself find one of the interesting keys to this opposition; but even this comment is not intended to be invidious. But how about this diversion of traffic which is so earnestly feared?

Let me say, as I have said before, Mr. President, that if I were a railroad worker in the State of Michigan at the present time, and I looked about me and saw half of my fellow railroad workers out of a job, and I saw half of our normal railroad traffic in suspension, I should be particularly suspicious of any kind of suggestion of any competitive transportation factor which might be injected into the situation at this subnormal and depressed point; and that is the thing that has been urged upon them. They have been asked to look about them and see the difficulties surrounding their traffic and their trade, and they have been asked whether, in the midst of such depression as this, they can afford to take a chance on any hazard whatsoever by way of additional competition; and, of course, they have said, "No; we cannot afford to take the chance." If I were in their position, and were confronted with the same premise, and asked to answer the same hypothesis, I should say, "No, sir; we cannot afford to take the chance."

But what is the actual fact that is confronting us?

The actual fact is that it will take at least 8 years to complete this seaway. The actual fact is that not until 1942 could this seaway ever take a single job away from a single railroad man, if ever. The answer is that not until 1942 could this seaway divert a single ton of traffic, a single pound of freight, from the existing railroad facilities, if ever. Does that not immediately create a totally different question?

We must deal with this prospectus in terms of 1942, and not in terms of 1934; and what is going to happen between now and 1942?

Where do we go for information if we want that question answered authentically in respect to transportation? We go to the Interstate Commerce Commission. At any rate, if we cannot go there for the best available information on that subject, we had better get a new Interstate Commerce Commission. What does the Interstate Commerce Commission tell us when we go there with that question? The Interstate Commerce Commission tells us that between now and 1950 the new transportation needs of this Nation will be 30 times the maximum contemplated traffic upon this seaway route! In other words, by 1942, proportionately and relatively, there is to be a need for 15 times as much transportation facility as the maximum load which is contemplated and anticipated for this seaway. Put differently, the seaway, by the time it opens, will take up just one fifteenth of what? Of the existing traffic? No; just one fifteenth of the new traffic to be developed between now and 1942!

Now let us confront that picture. Who now says to the railroad men that they need fear any immediate disaster as a result of this competition? The fear goes out of the window; and that is not all.

The preponderance of testimony before our committee upon this phase of the subject was that the collateral feeder traffic which will be induced as a result of the increased industrial and agricultural activity and markets to be produced by this seaway will infinitely more than offset any casual diversion as a result of the construction of the seaway.

So far as the State of Michigan is concerned, I am as sure as I stand upon this floor that this seaway has in it more business rather than less for Michigan; more jobs rather than less for Michigan labor; more jobs for Michigan railroad labor itself rather than less jobs; and if that prospectus were submitted with a request for the signatures of these good men and women, they would sign the petition just as quickly the other way around. It all depends what question is submitted.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I simply desire to state that the Senator's concluding remarks are substantiated by the transportation history of every country in the world—that waterway transportation has inceased rail transportation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator, and I know his statement is correct.

Before proceeding to the next sentence in this petition, I simply add this further observation in respect to possible diversion of traffic:

If the seaway will divert any traffic, it will divert only that traffic which may more economically move by ocean transportation. The traffic that belongs to the railroads because of economic efficiency will remain theirs. It is entirely predictable that the uplift given by this ocean transportation to the midcontinent will give to the very railroads now protesting—the mideastern carrier lines—and their employees an added burden of compensatory traffic that will more than replace any loss of ocean-seeking traffic that they may sustain by reason of the construction of the seaway.

Now, let us see what is the next reason which has moved these good men and women to sign these petitions and send them to me in such numbers.

The next reason is that the seaway will not benefit the wheat grower or furnish farm relief.

Mr. President, I do not propose to go into any calculations undertaking to demonstrate just how much the midwestern farmer is going to save on his wheat. I do not know what he will save; but I do know that it has been the well-nigh universal opinion of those best equipped to know the welfare of the American farmer that he does have an everlasting stake in this new outlet to the markets of the world; and if it be contended as a primary theory that the agricultural problem is a problem of exportable surpluses, then the problem in terms of transportation inevitably reduces itself to a problem of interoceanic transportation, and no other kind of transportation.

So far as the attitude of agriculture is concerned, Mr. President, I think I am within the fact when I state that almost every representative farm organization in this land has supported the seaway prospectus and asks today for its passage. Agriculture has spoken in no uncertain terms in favor of the pending project.

This very morning, as offsetting the other petitions to which I am referring, I am in receipt of a telegram from the master of the Michigan State Grange, Mr. C. H. Bramble, reading as follows:

The Michigan State Grange, representing its 500 local organizations, at its last annual meeting unanimously endorsed the St. Lawrence waterway project. We respectfully petition you to use your utmost endeavor for its passage and vote for the same.

Mr. President, I think that is pretty universally the voice of agriculture at the present time, in respect to this project.

I was particularly interested from the viewpoint of my own State of Michigan the other day, Mr. President, in noting that the cherry packers of northern Michigan have discovered the advantage of water transportation as a major means to answer their surplus problem, and that—

The Michigan Cherry Growers, Inc., of Traverse City, successfully loaded 20 carloads of the luscious fruit aboard a small ocean-going vessel which docked at the cherry capital last fall. This is simply a typical incident in passing.

I read from an article in the Muskegon Chronicle of January 25, 1934, as follows:

These shipments were distributed in such Atlantic-seaboard markets as New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington. Substantial savings in transportation charges were made by using the waterway.

The trial shipments are expected to be followed by larger cargoes of Michigan fresh and canned fruits this year. Leaders of the horticultural industry believe foreign as well as domestic business in such commodities could be developed. Pacific-coast and eastern orchardists annually market huge quantities of boxed and barreled apples in Europe, it was pointed out, but Michigan growers and shippers never have attempted to share in this foreign trade—on account of the rail-transportation costs to seaports.

Yet, Mr. President, it is said that this great undertaking can afford no possible advantage to agriculture in the Middle West. All of the responsible spokesmen for agriculture whom I have heard testify upon the subject testify without one single dissenting voice that their studies justify the conclusion that this is a major factor in farm relief for the American agriculturist.

Did American agriculture ever have a better friend in this body, Mr. President, than the late senior Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh, who sat yonder in his honored seat and enjoyed the deserved devotion of every man in the Chamber and the deserved confidence of the whole American people? The late Senator from Montana never had a project nearer to his heart than the St. Lawrence seaway. The seaway never had a champion equal to him in eloquence and persuasion. The seaway lost its greatest advocate when he passed to the great beyond. Yet time and time again he has said without reservation and without successful contradiction that so far as his section of America is concerned he wants no farm relief better than the farm relief that comes to him through the completion of this great St. Lawrence outlet for exportable surpluses to the markets of the world.

Let us now see what is the next thing in the petition which is submitted to me.

It is said that American labor will be one of the most serious losers from it.

Mr. President, I think I have already discussed the relationship of American labor. I am perfectly sure that American labor has a great stake in the stimulated industry of this country, and nothing can stimulate industry like successful water-borne commerce connecting our ports and our industrial centers with the great markets of the world. And as for any hazard from competitive projects coming back in, we are protected in the midcontinent by the same tariffs that protect the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, and if they are insufficient they can be increased.

What is the next thing that is offered to me as a persuasive reason for opposing this seaway? That it is not necessary to our foreign trade.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ERICKSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Did the Senator from Michigan say that some reason was offered to him for voting against this treaty? If anyone wasted his time that way, I do not know who it could be.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, there is nothing at all facetious about the presentation I am making. I will say to the Senator from Louisiana that a large group of my constituents have, I think, been misled into not believing in the St. Lawrence seaway. I dislike to disagree with great groups of my constituents except as I demonstrate to them that I have a profound and conscientious reason for disagreeing. I continue to disagree in spite of the arrival of the petitions, and I am undertaking to demonstrate the reasons.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to thank the Senator for having confessed that his constituents were against it. I have always known that the Michigan people were highly intellectual.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I desire to say, Mr. President, again that I am not facetious. The citizenship of my State, in my judgment, is 90 percent in favor of this great undertaking, and the citizens of Michigan are sufficiently intellectually honest, I will say to the Senator from Louisiana, so that I know that if they get the true facts, instead of the kind of facts circulated by the Senator from Louisiana, I would not have had any of these petitions at all.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I came into the Chamber, Mr. President, only a moment ago, and I heard some discussion of proposed or possible water power on the St. Lawrence in which some reference was made to the Senator from Washington, and because that has been brought into the argument several times, I desire to ask both the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] if this statement which I am about to read is correct. It is a part of a statement by the Federal Power Commission of the United States bearing date January 10, 1934, appearing on page 16, as follows:

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway project does not involve the United States in any expenditure for power development in those sections of the river which are entirely Canadian. The power in the most important Canadian section, i.e., the Soulanges Rapids section, is already being developed by Canadian private interests. This is no concern of the United States under the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project, but it does afford a cogent economic reason for the early development of power in the International Rapids section if the United States is to keep pace in providing cheap current for its rural and domestic consumers and for industry.

In other words, this is a statement and avowal of the Federal Trade Commission that any development of power in the purely Canadian sections of the river will neither be at the expense of the United States nor will it be any concern of the United States, except as we might, for purely academic reasons, or otherwise, be interested in what Canada does in the way of power production.

I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Illinois if that statement is correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is my understanding, Mr. President, that the statement is unequivocally correct.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, on this important point I am compelled to state upon the RECORD that it is wholly wrong. I should be glad, may I say to my able friend from Michigan, to have him show where this error or this inconsistency of conflict arises.

The able Senator from Michigan read a telegram to the Senate from Colonel Cooper in which Colonel Cooper confessed, as the telegram would indicate, that when he put his estimate of $1,350,000,000 cost of power it was upon the basis of but five million, which I said Canada said would have to be raised. The Senator from Michigan insists that that cannot be correct, because three million of the five million is to be done in Canada; therefore there would be no expense upon the United States as to this. It is that to which my able friend from Washington, if he will pause a minute and reflect, alludes. It is the allusion by the Federal Trade Commission of the portion that is allotted to Canada that that will not be chargeable to us.

But I call attention to the fact that even if it be true, say, that Canada develops 3,000,000 of the 5,000,000 horsepower, and that 2,000,000 horsepower in the section described by the Senator from Washington is for we Americans, on the basis which the Senator from Washington will recognize of $80 per horsepower the result will be that 2,000,000 horsepower at $80 per horsepower amounts to $1,600,000,000 to be paid by the United States. The 3,000,000 horsepower is the amount that is alluded to as the separate matter for Canada if she ever desires to do it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Illinois and I are at least in agreement on something, if I heard his final statement correctly, namely, that the answer to the Senator from Washington is that the final 3,000,000 horsepower is exclusively a Canadian concern. It is good to have that settled. Perhaps one bogie will now stay dead.

Mr. President, I have now gone through all of the other reasons which have been submitted in connection with these petitions, except the final one. The final reason is this:

We must furnish the bulk of the money for a project, first, benefiting another nation more than our own, and second, lying more largely in foreign territory than in our own, doubly a source of more unwanted foreign debt and of delicate international situations.

Mr. President, let me take one phrase out of that attenuated sentence to demonstrate beyond any possible opportunity of contravention that many of these positions are taken on a misconception of the facts. Will someone point out to me how there can be any foreign debts, unwanted or otherwise, connected with this enterprise in any possible way? I pause for a reply.

The obvious intent—I do not mean purposely, but unwittingly—the obvious intent of that language is to indicate that somehow or other we are paying for this enterprise through the extension of a Canadian credit, which in turn is to become part of international debts, which in turn are to be uncollectible, and therefore once more poor old Uncle Sam is holding the bag.

Of course, there is no relationship of that character whatsoever, directly or indirectly, or by any remote stretch of the imagination, involved in these contacts between the two countries. Nor is it true, except in technical contemporary terms, that we furnish the bulk of the money. We furnish the bulk of the money in respect to present construction because Canada heretofore has paid more than her share of the related seaway works; but this enterprise, Mr. President, summed as a whole represents $542,000,000 worth of undertaking under two flags. Part of it is under our flag. Part of it is under their flag. And when the mathematics are brought to their final conclusion, we pay half and Canada pays half.

I cannot for a moment concede that the undertaking is of greater benefit to another nation than to our own, but I readily concede that that is a matter of argument, and I am not undertaking to present an argument in connection with these petitions. I am undertaking solely to show that they have invited an expression of public opinion on the basis of a statement of facts that I believe to be erroneous. I am undertaking to show that if the facts had been set down as I believe them to be true, the signatures of these good men and women of my Commonwealth undoubtedly would have attached themselves more readily to my thesis than to the adverse petitions which I discuss.

On the question that the joint enterprise lies more largely in foreign territory, let this be said: Two thirds of the international section lies in our own American territory, and therefore the development in the international section inures primarily to our own benefit; and the international development is the major portion of the remaining work.

But suppose the other view be weighed. Suppose the larger Canadian sector, in respect to the entire waterway, be assessed. Is it not a far more logical thing to argue that it is distinctly to our advantage thus to get the full and untrammeled and perpetual navigation use of these waters in the control of a foreign sovereignty? What is it that we lose by thus acquiring these rights? I confess I do not understand.

The argument that it might involve us in international difficulties is too captious for real consideration. We have lived in amity with Canada ever since the Rush-Bagot agreement was signed in 1818, and without a single fort along the 3,000 miles of boundary. Canada gave us the perpetual right of navigation in the mouth of the St. Lawrence River in 1871. Ever since the treaty of 1909, we have had free navigation rights in the Welland Canal, and Canada has had reciprocal rights in all the Great Lakes, including Lake Michigan. Has it ever occurred to anybody heretofore that these relationships involve any hazard to our peace? Of course not. On the contrary, these relationships have contributed immeasurably to the perpetuation of our pacific relations. Are we or are we not to continue as good neighbors? I decline to vote that these relationships are at an end.

Mr. President, that is all I desire to say on this particular phase of the treaty argument. I do at this point, however, wish to introduce and ask to have printed in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the Port of Detroit Authority. They are typical of scores of similar resolutions from public bodies all over the commonwealth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution proposed by unanimous vote at meeting of the commissioners of the Port of Detroit Authority on January 17, there being present all five commissioners, who were as follows: William P. Bradley, chairman; Arthur P. Zirkaloso, vice chairman; Alvan Macauley, Jr.; John C. Cahalan, and George R. Fink. Resolution adopted at meeting on January 29, 1934

Whereas there was created by act of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, being Act No. 234, Public Acts of 1925, as amended by Public Acts of 1933, provisions for the establishment of port districts; and

Whereas the electorate of Wayne County at the general election on November 7, 1933, by a majority vote approved the creation of the Detroit Port District, which embraces all of Wayne County, containing approximately 40 miles of water frontage along the Detroit River, to be administered by the board of five commissioners named above, appointed by the Governor, William A. Comstock; and

Whereas this commission, under the acts named above, is charged with the power and duty, among other things, to develop and regulate a system of harbor improvements; and
